* A volume containing sixteen sermons has recently been published in Cincinnati. It is entitled "The Family Companion, or Book of Sermons on various subjects, both Doctrinal and Practical," and is the production of an editorial brother. A worthy brother who was on a visit to Nottingham having read the Sermon on Election, said, "It, of itself, is worth the price of the volume." We therefore concluded to give it in the Harbinger.—ED.

election is the following : That to elect is to choose, and that there is a time in the history of all the chosen when this election takes place ; that this election is obtained on certain conditions, and that these conditions are made known to all in the gospel, and all who comply with them become the elect of God ; while those who will not comply with God's terms of election, are reprobated by their own evil works, and, dying in this state, will be condemned because they had pleasure in unrighteousness.

This last view of the doctrine of election is ours ; but we have no doubt that many very honest persons hold the former. I have no doubt but that they honestly believe their views are found in the Holy Scriptures ; hence they will quote many passages to sustain the position they have taken on the subject. Well, we now design entering into a careful examination of most of the scriptures which are relied on to sustain the doctrine of eternal and unconditional election and passing by, for the purpose of seeing if they really do prove that doctrine.

But before entering upon this investigation, we concede that there have been many special, particular, and, I may say, unconditional elections under the government of the Heavenly Father. All such elections, however, were for the good of others, and not for the special and exclusive benefit of the persons elected. Christ is the elect of God, but he was chosen to give his life a ransom for all to be testified in due time." The seed of Abraham was an elect seed, but it was chosen to be the means of blessing others. "In thy seed," said God, "shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." Paul was a chosen vessel, but he was elected to go to the "Gentiles, to open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God, that they might obtain remission of sins, and an inheritance among the sanctified." But now, whether those thus elected enjoyed the favor of God, and got to heaven, depended upon the faithful discharge of the duties imposed upon them by virtue of their election. Hence Paul had to keep his body under subjection, lest after he had preached to others he himself should be a castaway.

But we now proceed to the investigation. The first scripture we will examine is found in Isaiah i. 5, 6, and reads thus :—"The whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint ; from the sole of the foot even unto the head, there is no soundness in it, but wounds and bruises, and putrifying sores." This scripture is adduced, not so much to prove the doctrine of election and passing by, as to support another feature of the system, namely—that all mankind are by nature totally and hereditarily depraved. It is held that by reason of this total depravity, man, in a state of nature, cannot think a good thought, or perform a good act ; and that all that is necessary in order to consummate the ruin of the whole world, is for God to withhold his special and enlightening grace. But that he does, of his own good will, impart illuminating and converting grace to the elect ; not to make them God's people, but to let them know that they are his.

I have sometimes heard this illustrated thus : A owes B fifty dollars, and is not able to pay it. C, as A's surety, pays the debt in the absence of A. Now B has no demand against A, but as A has no knowledge of the fact, he may have much uneasiness on the subject. But B now sends A a receipt, not because A has paid the fifty dollars, but to let him know that C has paid it for him. So God converts the sinner—not to make him God's elect, but to let him know that he was such.

Upon the scripture just quoted from Isaiah we will remark, that it has no reference to any person now living, and that it never was intended to apply to the moral state of man by nature. To prove this first remark, we need only read the 1st verse of the chapter and of the book. "The vision of Isaiah, the son of Amos, which he saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem, in the days of Uziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah." Thus you perceive that this vision had exclusive reference to Judah and Jerusalem in the days of these four kings. We sometimes illustrate the meaning of this scripture by the following figure:—Suppose a father has a rebellious son; he reasons with him, and exhorts him to obey his father, but he still refuses. He then chastises him, but he still disobeys; he lays upon him many stripes, but he still rebels, until his father exclaims, O! sinful child, why need you be stricken any more? You will rebel more and more. The head is sick, and the whole heart is faint; from head to foot there is no soundness; you are full of wounds and bruises by means of the stripes I have inflicted upon you. Come, now, and let us reason together upon this subject. Thus it was with the Jewish nation at that time. They had rebelled against God, and hence he says, "I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against me." For this rebellion God had brought on them one judgment after another, but still they rebelled, until he breaks forth in the doleful words first quoted, and declares that they are full of wounds from the sole of the foot even unto the head. The whole nation, from the king upon the throne to the meanest subject, were suffering on account of these chastisements of the Lord. Hence, he says, "Your country is desolate, your cities are burned with fire, your land strangers devour it in your presence, and it is desolate as overthrown by strangers. And the daughter of Zion is left as a cottage in a vineyard, as a lodge in a garden of cucumbers, as a besieged city." These judgments and calamities are the wounds and bruises complained of in this prophecy, and these were brought upon them for their own wickedness, and not because of their natural depravity.

The next scripture that we shall notice, is found in the first chapter of Ephesians, and reads thus: "According as he hath chosen us in him, before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy, and without blame before him in love; having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself. In whom we have also obtained an inheritance, being predestinated according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will" (Eph. i. 4, 5, 11.) You will notice that the apostle does not say of these persons that they were predestinated children, but that they were predestinated unto the adoption of children—that is, they were predestinated to be adopted into the family of God by Jesus Christ. But now, in order to enjoy the benefits of this predestination, it was necessary for them to be adopted. I proceed to make the following propositions:—First, some of the very persons who were thus predestinated, failed to enjoy the benefits of their predestination, and were lost. Second, some who were not of the predestinated number here spoken of, were adopted into the family of God, and sealed with the Holy Spirit. If these two points can be sustained, you perceive that we need not be much concerned to know whether we are of the predestinated number or not—for if we are, we may be lost; and if we are not, still we may be saved: and thus it will be seen that this scripture does not sustain the doctrine of unconditional, eternal election and passing-by.

But in order to understand this scripture, we must notice who the writer is, and who the persons addressed are. Paul is the writer, and he was a Jew. He says, "I also am an Israelite, of the seed of Abraham." This address was made to those who had embraced the Christian religion from among the Gentiles; and hence the apostle says to them, "Remember, that ye being in time past Gentiles in the flesh, who are called uncircumcision by that which is called the circumcision in the flesh made by hands" (ii. 11, 12.) Then we have a Christian Jew writing to Gentile Christians.

Now, you will notice, that the apostle changes his mode of address some two or three times in the course of the chapter. "Grace be to you from God our Father" (v. 9.) Here he addresses them in the second person, but in the 4th verse he changes his mode of address, and says, "According as he hath chosen us (not you) in him from the foundation of the world." "Having predestinated us (not you, Gentiles) unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ." But at the 13th verse he again changes the person of his address, and says, "In whom ye also trusted, after that ye heard the word of truth," &c. Now, by the particle also, the apostle shows that the persons spoken of in this verse were not included in anything said from the close of the third verse to the commencement of the 13th—consequently, they did not belong to the predestinated number of whom Paul here speaks; and yet when they believed, they were sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise. But of those predestinated it is said, "He came to his own, and his own received him not; but as many as received him, to them gave he the power to become the sons of God, even to them that believed on his name" (John i. 11, 12.)

Thus you perceive that the Jews were the predestinated—they were predestinated before the foundation of the Jewish age, to be adopted the children of God; but faith in Christ was one of the conditions of the adoption. Hence those who did not believe never obtained the privilege of this adoption. But when the Gentiles who were not thus specially predestinated believed in Christ, they obtained the power to become the sons of God. They trusted in Christ, and were sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise.

The next scripture we will notice, which is relied on to prove the doctrine of unconditional and eternal election, is found in the eighth chapter of Romans, and reads thus: "For whom he foreknew, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the first-born among many brethren. Moreover, whom he did predestinate, them he also called; and whom he called, them he also justified; and whom he justified, them he also glorified" (v. 29-30.)

In order to understand this scripture, as well as other portions of this epistle, which we shall examine in this investigation, it will be necessary to notice the design of the Apostle's argument.

At the time this letter was written (as noticed in a previous discourse) a controversy was going on in reference to the privileges which should be granted to those who turned to God from among the Gentiles. The Jews contended that the privileges and blessings of the gospel should not be granted unto the Gentile world. The Apostles taught that God had granted unto the Gentiles all the blessings of the gospel, on the same terms on which they were offered to the Jews. That, under the reign of Christ, no difference was made between the two nations, but that all stood on equal ground, so far as the gospel was concerned. This accounts for the following expression, found in this letter: "I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ; for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth: to the Jew first, and also to the Greek" (ch. i. 16.) "Tribulation and anguish upon every soul of man that doeth evil, of the Jew first, and also of the Gentile; but glory, and honour, and peace, to every one that worketh good, to the Jew first, and also to the Gentile" (ch. ii. 9-10.) "Are we (Jews) better than they (the Gentiles)? No, in no wise; for we have before proved, both Jews and Gentiles, that they are all under sin" (ch. iii. 9.) Is he the God of the Jews only? Is he not also of the Gentiles? Yes, of the Gentiles. Cometh this blessedness on the circumcision only, or upon the uncircumcision also?" (ch. iv. 9.)

You will find, my friends, that this epistle abounds with expressions of this kind, all of which go to show, beyond the possibility of doubt or cavil, that Paul's main object in writing this letter, was to settle the controversy above mentioned, and to prove that, under the gospel, no difference should be made between Jew and Gentile; that all should enjoy the same privileges. To oppose this view, the Jews would refer to the high privileges and national glory which God granted them under the Old Covenant, and contend that these blessings were granted to them because they were better than other men. But the Apostle tells them, that as a nation, they are no better than the Gentiles, but that God had given them these honors because of a predestination which had passed in his mind, long before they were brought into the actual possession of them. For whom he did foreknow, he did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son. But we now ask, whom did he foreknow? Near the conclusion of this general argument, the Apostle says: "Hath God cast away his people? God forbid. For I also am an Israelite, of the seed of Abraham, of the tribe of Benjamin. God hath not cast away his people, whom he foreknew" (chapter xi. 1, 2.) That is, God hath not cast away the whole Jewish nation; for "as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God." This shows clearly that the Jewish nation, or the seed of Abraham, was the foreknown of God, who were predestinated to be conformed to the image of his Son; or, according to Ephesians i. 4, to be adopted into the family of God.

Now, says the Apostle, in reference to those whom he foreknew, "Whom he did predestinate, them he also called." But when and where did he call these predestinated ones? "When Israel was a child, then I loved him, and called my Son out of Egypt" (Hosea xi. 1.) By the hands of Moses did God call and bring his people whom he foreknew, or approved before, out of the land of bondage, unto a goodly land. And those whom he thus called, he also justified. He justified them in going into the land of Canaan, and taking possession of it. On what principle could they have been justified in driving out the holders of the land, and taking it into their own possession, only that God foreknew them in the covenant he made with their father Abraham, which covenant secured to them this land? "And whom he justified, them he also glorified." The word glorified, Webster defines thus: "Honored, dignified, exalted to glory." One of the prophets, speaking of the glory [which had once dwelt in the house of God, among the Jews, but which had been lost by reason of sin, says: "I will shake all nations, and the desire of all nations shall come, and I will fill this house with glory, saith the Lord of hosts. The glory of this latter house (the temple rebuilt) shall be greater than of the former, saith the Lord of hosts" (Hag. ii. 7-9.) Yes, my friends, God gave this people glory and honour above all the nations of the earth. He even honored them with the emblem of the divine presence. Hence, we learn, that when Moses had finished the tabernacle, "then a cloud covered the tent of the congregation, and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle" (Ex. xl. 34.)

Thus was the seed of Abraham foreknown, called, justified, and glorified; and the apostle introduces these facts here, to show them that they had not attained these privileges by their own good works, but they were granted unto them by virtue of a divine arrangement made with Abraham, before they were horn. The conclusion, then, would be if God sees proper to grant the blessings of the gospel to the Gentiles, the Jews ought not to complain; that God's manner of dealing with them would fully justify him in extending all gospel blessings to the whole world, on the same terms. Thus it will be seen, that instead of this scripture proving the doctrine of eternal, unconditional election to heavenly glories, it is but a part of an argument levelled directly against that very doctrine.

I know that some good brethren apply this passage to the ancient saints who have been called from earth to glory—perhaps those who rose at the resurrection of Christ—but I can see no reason why Paul should introduce those persons into this argument. I cannot see what bearing their case would have had upon the subject. But the view we have presented is in good keeping with the whole argument, as will appear more fully as we proceed.

We will now invite attention to the ninth chapter of this epistle. This chapter has been thought to contain more Calvinism than any other portion of the New Testament. Some have called Paul a Calvinist, and the Apostle James an Arminian; but we make no such distinctions among the witnesses of our Lord.

But to the chapter. "I say the truth in Christ; I lie not, my conscience also bearing me witness in the Holy Ghost, that I have great heaviness and continual sorrow in my heart. For I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh." Paul seems to make this statement for the purpose of preparing his brethren for his following arguments, and especially for a declaration which he makes in the eleventh chapter: "What then! Israel hath not obtained that which he seeketh for; but the election hath obtained it, and the rest were blinded," &c. (v. 7.)

He would seem to say, I do not make this statement out of any ill will which I entertain toward my brethren, for "I have great heaviness and continual sorrow in my heart" for them. Some render this passage thus: "I have great grief and unceasing anguish in my heart, for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh, (for I also was, myself, wishing to be accursed from Christ)." That is, I have great feeling for them, for I had once the same views of Christ which they now have.

This rendering seems natural, and well agrees with Paul's past history. He then proceeds to speak of his brethren thus: "Who are Israelites! To whom pertaineth the adoption?" &c. By virtue of the predestination which we have already noticed, the adoption belonged to them. But by rejecting Christ, they lost this privilege. "Not as though the Word of God hath taken none effect. For they are not all Israel who are of Israel. Neither because they are the seed of Abraham, are they all children, but in Isaac shall thy seed be called. That is, they which are the children of the flesh, these are not the children of God; but the children of the promise are counted for the seed. For this is the word of promise, at this time will I come, and Sarah shall have a son." Ishmael was indeed a son of Abraham, but not the son of promise; but Isaac being the promised son, the seed was reckoned in him.

"For this is the word of promise. At this time will I come, and Sarah shall have a son." This reference to the promise which God made to Abraham, Paul makes, for the purpose of showing that the Lord granted unto Isaac the privilege of being progenitor of the promised seed because of that promise, and not because of any good thing which he had done. And the force of this remark will be seen at once, when we consider the subject which the apostle is discussing. You will remember, my friends, that the great Apostle of the Gentiles is here defending the rights and privileges of that people. The subject of privilege, then, is the subject under consideration. The Jews claimed privileges above the Gentiles, on account of their good works, and because of the high favors which God had conferred upon them. But Paul here lets them know that Isaac received the privilege of being the progenitor of the chosen seed, by virtue of a promise made to his father before he was born; and hence, that it could not have been on account of any good works which he had done. The natural conclusion would then be this: that if God saw proper to grant the blessings of the gospel to the Gentiles, the Jews had no reason to complain.

This view will appear still more fully as we proceed. "And not only so," (God not only chose Isaac in preference to Ishmael) "but when Rebecca also had conceived by one, even by our father Isaac, (for the children being not yet born, neither having done any good nor evil, that the purpose of God, according to election, might stand, not of works, but of him that calleth) it was said unto her, the elder shall serve the younger" (10, 11, 12.) The eleventh verse is a parenthesis, and hence we would understand the apostle better by reading the tenth and twelfth verses together; thus, "when Rebecca had conceived by one, even by our father Isaac, it was said unto her, The elder shall serve the younger."

But then the question may be asked, Why was this said unto her? Paul answers, "That the purpose of God, according to election, might stand." And what was that purpose? We answer, that the promised seed might be reckoned in Jacob, and not in Esau. This was not an election of heavenly glories, and a reprobation to eternal ruin. Heaven and hell are not the subjects under consideration. The promised seed must of necessity be counted in one of these two sons, and God had the right to say which; and by the exercise of that right, he chose, or elected, Jacob for that purpose. But in doing so, he did not consign Esau to eternal torment. Nor did the choosing of Jacob for the purpose here spoken of, secure to him a place in heaven without any further effort on his part. This depended upon his personal conduct in this life.

But the Apostle proceeds: "As it is written, Jacob have I loved, and Esau have I hated." Without noticing the connection of these verses, some have thought that Paul here teaches that God loved Jacob and hated Esau before they were born. But, my friends, by looking at this passage again, you will perceive that the Apostle does not say that God said unto Rebecca, that he had loved Jacob and hated Esau; but, that the elder should serve the younger. And then he says, "As it is written, Jacob have I loved, and Esau have I hated." But we ask, Where was this written? We answer, in the very last book in the Old Testament — some twelve hundred years after Jacob and Esau had both gone to the silence of the tomb. That we may understand this declaration, we must remember that the names of Jacob and Esau were applied to their descendants, after their death, as national titles. The whole Jewish nation was called Jacob, and Israel, after their father; and the same is true in reference to Esau. And hence, the hatred and love mentioned in Malachi i. 2, 3, applied to Jacob and Esau nationally, and not individually. In this passage the Lord complains of Israel, saying: "I have loved you, saith the Lord; yet ye say, wherein hast thou loved us?" Then God answers: "Was not Esau Jacob's brother? saith the Lord, yet I loved Jacob, and hated Esau, and laid his mountains and his heritage waste for the dragons of the wilderness."

But the question may now be started, Why did the hatred or displeasure of the Lord thus rest upon Esau, or the Edomites? A plain and satisfactory answer will be found in the Book of Obadiah. We commence reading at the eighth verse : " Shall I not in that day, saith the Lord, even destroy the wise men out of Edom, and understanding out of Mount Esau ? And thy mighty men, O Teman, shall be dismayed, to the end that every one of the Mount of Esau may be cut off by slaughter." But why did God thus deal with the descendants of Esau ? Was it because he had determined so to deal with them even before their father was born ? Or was it on account of their own personal wickedness ? Hear the answer, my friends : " For thy violence against thy brother Jacob, shame shall cover thee, and thou shalt be cut off for ever " (v. 10.)

After the Lord had called to remembrance the unrighteous conduct of that people, he proceeds thus : " For the day of the Lord is near upon all the Heathen ; AS THOU HAST DONE, IT SHALL BE DONE UNTO THEE ; THY REWARD SHALL RETURN UPON THINE OWN HEAD " (v. 15.) Thus, my friends, you perceive that, instead of this passage favouring eternal and unconditional election to heavenly glories, and reprobation to eternal burnings, it proves that just and equitable doctrine, that God will render to every man according to his works.

But we now return to the consideration of the ninth chapter of Romans. " What shall we say then ? Is there unrighteousness with God ? God forbid. For he saith to Moses, I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion " (verses 14-15.) That God has the sovereign right to exercise his mercy and compassion on whom he will, none will deny. But if it be asked, Upon whom will he exercise his mercy ? we answer in the words of David : " With the merciful thou wilt show thyself merciful, and with the upright thou wilt show thyself upright. With the pure thou wilt show thyself pure, and with the froward thou wilt show thyself froward ; and the afflicted people thou wilt save ; but thine eyes are upon the haughty, that thou mayest bring them down " (Sam. xxii. 26, 27, 28.)

But Paul proceeds : " So then it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that showeth mercy " (v. 16.) With what an appearance of triumph do predestinarians introduce this scripture into their religious discourses ! This declaration is applied to the subject of becoming Christians, and getting to heaven, and from it, it is argued that these blessings are not to be obtained by willing or striving—that the sinners must wait God's good time, and if he wills to have mercy upon them, he will do so without any willing or running on their part—for, say they, it is not of him that willeth, nor him that runneth, but of God that showeth mercy.

But, my friends, the whole meaning of this passage turns upon the little neuter pronoun IT. Surely, it will not do to make pardon, and heaven, the antidote to it, in this sentence, when these subjects have not even been mentioned in the preceding connection. What is the subject under consideration ? We again remind you, friends, that the Apostle is here discussing the subject of privilege ; and now referring to what he had said about the privileges granted to Isaac and Jacob, and which had long continued to their posterity, he says : " It is not of him that willeth, nor runneth, but of God that showeth mercy." You know, my dear hearers, that Isaac willed that Esau should have the blessing, and Esau ran for it, but Jacob got it, and with it the privilege of being the progenitor of the promised seed. But why is this matter referred to here by the Apostle ? I answer, to prove to the Jews that if God sees proper to grant the privileges of the gospel to the Gentiles, the Jews have no right to complain, for the matter of privilege is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God, who alone has the right to offer gospel privileges to whom he will.

" For the Scripture saith unto Pharoah, Even for this same purpose have I raised thee up, that I might show my power in thee, and that my name might be declared throughout all the earth. Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will, he hardeneth " (17, 18.)

This passage has also been forced into the service of those who teach the doctrine of unconditional election and passing by. But if it has anything to do with that doctrine, it not only proves that God saves the elect unconditionally, but that he also hardens the hearts of those whom he has passed by, and thus makes their condition even worse than it is by nature! WORSE AND WORSE. The advocates of the doctrine which we are now examining, tell us that all men are, by nature, totally and hereditarily depraved, and all that is necessary to consummate their ruin, is for God to withhold from them his enlightening and quickening grace. And then, in order to sustain a falling system, it must be made to appear, that notwithstanding the non-elect are by nature wholly indisposed to do any good thing, yet, lest they should peradventure put forth their hands and obey the Lord, God hardens their hearts, and makes them worse than even total depravity itself!

In regard to Pharaoh's case, we differ from many who do not believe in the doctrine of eternal election. Some suppose that God only hardened Pharaoh's heart by conferring blessings upon him; as blessings rejected tend to harden: but from the entire testimony found in the history of that wicked king, I am bound to believe that God did directly and miraculously harden his heart.

By referring to Exodus iv. 21, you see that when God appeared unto Moses to send him into Egypt to deliver Israel, he told him that he would harden the heart of Pharaoh. This promise was made before Moses had even performed one miracle in the presence of Pharaoh, or had brought one judgment upon him. And by reading the whole history of that wicked monarch, you will find that it is said three times that Pharaoh hardened his own heart; three times it is said that his heart was hardened, without saying who did it; four times God said that he would harden his heart, and seven times it is said most positively that God did harden his heart. We therefore conclude that the Lord did harden Pharaoh's heart; but we ask, Why did he do it? The Lord answers: "That I might show my power in thee, and that my name might be declared throughout all the earth."

When any government decides that for certain crimes the transgressor shall be put to death, the same government has a right to say in what way he shall be executed, and all wise and benevolent men seek to make the execution accomplish the greatest amount of good to the living.

On this very principle did God act toward Pharaoh. He had forfeited his life by his own wicked works, and the Lord determined to identify his death with the deliverance of his people, in such a manner as to show that he did not come to his end in an ordinary way, but that he was destroyed by the direct power of God. This would be calculated to deter others from wickedness.

According to this view, we read that when the children of Israel were upon the banks of the Red Sea, and Pharaoh and his hosts now in sight, that "the Lord said unto Moses: * * * Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward, * * * and I, even I, will harden the hearts of the Egyptians, and they shall follow them, and I will get me honor upon Pharaoh, and upon his hosts" (Ex. xiv. 13, &c.)

But why is this case alluded to here? I answer, to show the Jews that notwithstanding God had broken them off from the blessings and privileges of the gospel, and had poured upon them the spirit of sleep and slumber, and darkened their eyes so that they might not see, he had only treated them as he had treated others for their sins. Thus, it will be seen that this passage has nothing whatever to do with the doctrine of unconditional election and passing by.

But let us continue our examination of the ninth chapter of Romans. "Thou wilt say then unto me, Why doth he yet find fault? for who hath resisted his will? Nay, but O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say unto him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus? Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honour, and another unto dishonour?"

This scripture has long been used to support the doctrine of unconditional and eternal election and reprobation.

Some seem to think, that because God has the same right to dispose of men according to his own pleasure that the potter possesses over his clay, that it follows, as a matter of course, that he has predestined the eternal destiny of all men. But this is by no means a fair conclusion. Because the potter has power over his clay, to make of the same lump one vessel for a more honorable purpose than another, it does not follow that he will make some vessels for destruction.

But because we are not willing to admit that God did, from all eternity, elect some men and angels to everlasting glory, and that he passed by all others, and left them to be eternally miserable—some think that we limit the power of God—that we are not willing for the Lord of the universe to do as he pleases with his own. But we are the last persons to object to the sovereignty of the Lord. We believe that he has the same power over the whole human family that the potter has over the clay. Yes, we are all in the hands of God, as clay in the hands of the potter. He has an undisputed right to dispose of all men according to his own will, and to stipulate the terms upon which he will make one man a vessel of honor, and another of dishonor.

At this point, Predestinarians object, virtually, to the sovereignty of God, and manifest an unwillingness for the heavenly Father to do as he pleases. Yes, at this very point, this charge, which they have so often preferred against others, falls upon themselves. They oppose the very idea of conditions in this matter, and would reason the Lord out of his own terms, because, forsooth, they think it incompatible with the sovereign power of God, for him to suspend the destiny of man upon conditions. But we contend that the Lord has a right to do with us as seemeth to him good, and that he has suspended our weal or woe on our own conduct.

Inasmuch, then, as we are all in the hands of God, as clay in the hands of the potter, we ask, on what terms does the Lord propose to make vessels of honor, or of dishonor? This is an important question; it has in it interests which reach into the world of spirits, and lay hold on things invisible and eternal. That we may fully understand this matter, we will now turn to the eighteenth chapter of Jeremiah, and read from the commencement:—"The word came to Jeremiah from the Lord, saying, arise and go down to the potter's house, and behold, he wrought a work on the wheels. And the vessel that he made of clay was marred in the hand of the potter; so he made it again, another vessel, as seemed good to the potter to make it" (v. 1, 2, 3, 4.)

pired before the prophet. The potter had intended to make one kind of vessel of the lump upon which he was operating when the prophet visited him; but it was marred in his hands, so that it would not answer the purpose first proposed. Well, the clay was his own; he could do as he pleased with it, and therefore he just made of it another vessel, according to his own will.

While this example was resting upon the prophet's mind—while he was reflecting upon the manner in which the potter had disposed of that piece of clay, he says:—"Then the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, O house of Israel, cannot I do with you as this potter? saith the Lord. Behold, as the clay is in the potter's hands, so are ye in my hand, O house of Israel" (v. 5, 6.)

From this declaration, you see that the Lord applies this parable to the house of Israel, and by it would give the Jews to understand, that they, as a nation, were in his hand, as clay in that potter's hand—and that he could mould them into vessels of honor and dishonor, according to his own good pleasure. But he does not leave them without farther instruction, for he proceeds to tell them his own terms—or conditions, if you please—upon which the honor or dishonor of any people rests. Hear it

"At what instant I shall speak concerning a nation, and concerning a kingdom, to pluck, and to pull down, and to destroy it: if that nation against whom I have pronounced, turn from their evil, I will repent of the evil that I thought to do unto them. And at what instant I shall speak concerning a kingdom, to build and to plant it: if it do evil in my sight, that it obey not my voice, then I will repent of the good wherewith I said I would benefit them" (v. 7, 8, 9, 10.)

This removes the veil from the doctrine of the potter and the clay, and shows, in the light of heaven's eternal truth, the principle upon which every man's destiny will be for ever settled. The people of Nineveh understood this principle, and notwithstanding God had said, by the mouth of his prophet, "Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown"—without expressing one single condition—yet they, believing God, repented in sackcloth and ashes, and cried mightily to God, saying, "Who can tell if God will turn and repent, and turn away from his fierce anger, that we perish not." And the Lord did deal with them according to the principle developed in the eighteenth chapter of Jeremiah; for when "God saw their works, that they turned from their evil way, he repented of the evil that he had said that he would do unto them, and he did it not" (See Jonah iii.)

But if any should ask, why does Paul introduce the potter and the clay into his argument, in the ninth of Romans, we answer, for the purpose of justifying the ways of God to man, and to shew the Jews, that notwithstanding they had been formed of the Lord for vessels of honor, yet by their own evil doings they had become marred in the hands of the Lord, so that he was now about to mould them into vessels of dishonor. He had endured with much long-suffering these vessels of wrath, who had fitted themselves for destruction; but he now determined to bear with them no longer: hence Paul declares, in this general connection, that they were broken off because of unbelief. As a nation, God has dealt with them as the potter, whom Jeremiah saw, did with the clay. They were marred in his hand, and he had made them vessels of dishonor, even unto this day.

Paul would further prove, by the example of the potter and the clay, that if the Gentiles should turn from their sins, and do that which is right, the Lord will make them vessels of honor, and that no one durst reply against God; "for the potter has power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honor, and another to dishonor."

Thus you perceive that this chapter, when rightly understood, according to the apostle's design, fails, utterly fails, to sustain the doctrine of eternal, unconditional election and passing by; and hence, that system must go off limping to some other part of the good book for support.

But if any should ask, Is the principle laid down in the eighteenth of Jeremiah found anywhere in the New Testament? we refer them to 2 Tim. ii. 20, 21.

After the apostle had named many vices which were practiced by men, he says: "But in a great house, there are not only vessels of gold and silver, but also of wood and of earth, and some to honor, and some to dishonor. If a man, therefore, purge himself from these, (the crimes just named) he shall be a vessel unto honor, sanctified, and meet for the master's use, and prepared unto every good work."

Here we have the same principle set forth, and hence we would say to you to-day, if you wish to be vessels of honor, prepared for heavenly glory, purge yourselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit, and endeavour to perfect holiness in the sight of God.

But we will now consider the scripture which we read at the commencement of this discourse.

"Peter, an apostle of Jesus Christ, to the strangers scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, through sanctification of the spirit unto obedience, and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ" (1 Pet. i. 1, 2.)

Notwithstanding this passage of Scripture does prove the doctrine of election, yet it does not prove the doctrine of unconditional, eternal election and passing by, for the following reasons:

1. They were elected through the sprinkling of the blood of Christ; but they could not have been thus sprinkled before they were born.

2. They were elected through a sanctification of spirit unto obedience, or by having their spirits set apart to obedience. This was a personal matter, and could not have been performed "before the world was made, or Adam formed."

3. They were elected according to the foreknowledge of God. Now, foreknowledge is generally understood to mean knowledge of an event before it comes to pass; hence, these persons were elected according to a system of which God had knowledge before they were elected. This being so, they could not have been elected from all eternity; for in that case, their election would have been as old as God's knowledge. There could have been no foreknowledge about it.

4. But in the fourth place, we remark, that to elect is to choose—to choose is an act—every act implies a time when it is performed, and hence no act can be performed from all eternity; therefore these persons were not thus elected. It is just as contradictory to say that the elect were chosen from all eternity, as to say that the world was made from all eternity. Should an individual assume the last position, you would all reply that this could not be. You would say, that if the world was made, it is not eternal; and if it is eternal, it never was made. Just so we say in reference to election. If they were Christ's people from all eternity, they never were elected; and if they were elected, they were not his, in this special sense, from all eternity. But Peter says, they were the elect of God, and hence they were not chosen from all eternity.

The phrase "foreknowledge," in the Scriptures, generally refers to something which God has made known before—hence the elect of God, in the gospel dispensation, are chosen according to a system of which God had given some knowledge before it was fully developed. This knowledge is found in various parts of the Old Testament, but particularly named in the thirty-first chapter of Jeremiah. In this chapter, God promises the New Covenant, in which promise he says: "I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts, and will be their God, and they shall be my people."

You will notice that they were not the people of God at the time this knowledge was given, for, saith he, "they shall be my people," referring to some future time.

Now all who were elected according to the stipulations of that covenant, when made, were elected according to the foreknowledge of God. This covenant we all understand to be the gospel, or New Testament of our Lord and Saviour.

Now that we may fully understand this matter, we will introduce the first elections which ever took place by virtue of the New Covenant. This covenant never could be ratified while the Old Covenant stood, and hence Christ took it out of the way, nailing it to his cross. But as Christ was to be the mediator of this New Covenant, it never could be in full force until he appeared, with his own blood, in the presence of God, for all who should become the elect of God according to that new institution; hence said Jesus to his disciples, "Tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem until ye be endowed with power from on high."

According to this command, after the Lord ascended, "they returned unto Jerusalem from the mount called Olivet, which is from Jerusalem a Sabbath-day's journey. And when they were come in, they went up into an upper room," where about one hundred and twenty of the disciples remained together, waiting for this super-human power, by which they should know that their Lord was crowned, the covenant sealed, and all things were ready to commence this great work of election.

While they were thus in one place, with one accord, "suddenly there came a sound from heaven as of a rushing mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting. And there appeared unto them cloven tongues, like as of fire, and it sat upon each of them. And they were all filled with the Holy Spirit, and began to speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance."

By this divine power the Apostles were enabled to speak to the understanding of all present. They pointed out to them the wickedness of their former conduct, and proved by testimony which they could not doubt, that God had raised the same Jesus whom they crucified from the dead, and made him both Lord and Christ. "Now when they heard this, they were pierced in their hearts, and said unto Peter, and to the rest of the Apostles, Men and brethren, what shall we do?"

These very persons had long been the people of God, nationally, by virtue of the Old Covenant, but they now saw that this covenant was done away; that they could claim nothing upon its principles; that they had sinned egregiously in rejecting and crucifying the Lord of glory; and that unless they could obtain pardon, and become the elect of God, by virtue of the New Covenant which God promised by the prophet Jeremiah, they must be miserable for ever. Overwhelmed with these awful reflections, and pierced in their very hearts, they cried out, "Men and brethren, what shall we do?"

Will you hear the answer of these newly inspired witnesses of our divine Lord? O hear it, and let it sink deep into every heart. "REPENT AND BE BAPTIZED EVERY ONE OF YOU, IN THE NAME OF JESUS CHRIST, FOR THE REMISSION OF YOUR SINS, AND YOU SHALL

RECEIVE THE GIFT OF THE HOLY SPIRIT. * * * Then they that gladly received the word were baptized; and the same day there were added unto them (that is, unto the elect of God) about three thousand souls."

Thus, on that day, were about three thousand persons elected according to the foreknowledge of God, the Father; that is, according to a plan of which God had knowledge before it was sealed by the blood of his Son. And we now say to you, one and all, that you may all become the elect of God on the same terms. God is not a respecter of persons—all who will, may come and take the waters of life freely.

Having now seen that the Scriptures, which are generally relied on to prove the doctrine of unconditional and eternal election, have no reference whatever to that doctrine—that they treat of other subjects—and that, consequently, that doctrine has no support in the oracles of eternal truth, we shall proceed to offer a few arguments in favor of the views which we entertain on this subject, and then close this discourse.

1. The first argument we shall offer to prove that all men may be saved, is drawn from the parable of the talents, recorded in the twenty-fifth chapter of Matthew. Commencing at the 14th verse, we read as follows: "For the kingdom of heaven is as a man travelling into a far country, who called his own servants and delivered unto them his goods. And unto one he gave five talents, to another two, and to another one: to every man according to his several ability; and straightway took his journey." We are informed by the witness of our divine Lord, that "after a long time the Lord of these servants cometh and reckoneth with them." Unto two of them he said, "enter into the joy of thy Lord;" but concerning the third, he said, "take the talent from him, and cast him into outer darkness; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth."

Now, we ask, why was this difference made? Was it because the Lord of these servants had from all eternity chosen two of them to be participants of his joy, while he passed by the other? No! the difference in their condition was made upon a more righteous principle. It was because the first occupied until their Lord came. They were busily engaged in doing his will; and hence he said unto them, "WELL DONE good and faithful servant. You have been faithful over a few things, I will make you rulers over many things." But the other buried his Lord's money in the earth, and spent his time in idleness; he did not obey his Lord, and hence he was declared to be a wicked and unprofitable servant, and for this wickedness he was cast into outer darkness.

Now, all this means something; and we ask, what is it intended to teach? The Saviour answers: "The kingdom of heaven is like unto" this. That is, this represents God's manner of dealing with the children of men. All are his servants; he has made of one blood all nations that dwell upon the face of the whole earth. And he has given to all talents to be occupied in his service—and all who do occupy according to his will, shall enter into everlasting joys in heaven; while those who "refuse and rebel, shall be destroyed, for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it."

2. Our second argument is, the fact that salvation is offered in the Scriptures to all. When the angel appeared to the shepherds in Bethlehem's fields, he said unto them, "Fear not, for behold we bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be unto all people."

This has reference to the great salvation offered in the gospel which Christ had now come to prepare; and from the language of the angel, it is certain that God designed that this salvation should be offered unto all people. But if a part of the human family had been passed by in the councils of grace, and in consequence of that fact they could have no part in this salvation, I ask, how could the Saviour's birth be good news to all people?

When the Lord had finished the work of teaching and suffering which he came to do, just before he ascended up on high, he said unto his disciples, "Thus it is written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead the third day; and that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name, among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem" (Luke xxiv. 46, 47.) "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature; he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned" (Mark xvi. 16.) From these scriptures you see that it is the will of God, set forth in the command of Christ his Son, that the glad news of salvation should be preached among all nations, and to every intelligent creature; that repentance is enjoined upon all, and remission of sins promised to all who obey.

Now, if there is a portion of our race for whom this salvation was never provided, then this whole procedure is nothing but solemn mockery. It would be more consistent with the character of the good Lord for him to steal away the elect from our world, and take them to glory without letting those whom he passed by know that any beings in the universe fared better than they. But instead of this, angels are dispatched from the high courts of glory to announce the glad news of salvation to men, assuring them that it was to be unto all men; and we find the Saviour enjoining no secrecy upon his disciples on this subject: nay, he even commands them to proclaim the glad news among all nations, and to all people; and hence we conclude that all may become the elect of God, and enjoy this salvation if they will.

3. Our third argument is drawn from the mercy and goodness of God. That the Lord God is abundant in mercy and goodness, is taught throughout both Testaments.

Now what would you say of a father who should make ample provision for all the wants of a part of his children, and pass by the rest while in a state of helplessness, and leave them to starve in his sight? You would all condemn him as a monster in human form. And shall we attribute such conduct to the merciful Lord? God has made of one blood all nations that dwell on the face of the whole earth; and shall we say that he has provided for all the spiritual wants of a part of this great family, and that he has passed by the remaining portion, leaving them to perish in their sins, without providing any means for their recovery? That he has made no provision for their salvation, but that they are left to perish as a matter of dire necessity? All the finer feelings of the human heart revolt at the very thought! It cannot be that God has thus dealt with his creature, man. His mercy and goodness forbid such an idea.

4. As a fourth argument, we state the fact that Christ died for all. In proof of this declaration we read the following scriptures: "We see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels, for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honor, that he, by the grace of God, should taste death for every man" (Heb. iii. 9.) "For there is one God, and one Mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all to be testified in due time" (1 Tim. ii. 5, 6.) "If any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous; and he is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world" (1 John ii. 1, 3.) "We thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead; and that he died for all, that they who live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him that died for them and rose again" (2 Cor. v. 14, 16.)

From these scriptures it is clear that Christ died alike for all men; and hence we come to the irresistible conclusion, that all may receive the same benefits from his death on the same terms. If some may obtain remission of sins and adoption into the family of God by faith in the blood of Jesus Christ, all may. If the blood of sprinkling which Christ shed on Calvary speaketh better things than the blood of Abel, it speaks these better things for all. If it speaks pardon for any, it speaks pardon for all, on the same terms.

5. We argue, in the fifth place, that all may come to Christ, obtain pardon, and thus become the elect of God, from the fact that the invitations of the Bible embrace all mankind. God says, "Look unto me and be ye saved, all ye ends of the earth" (Is. xlv. 22.) "Ho every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money come" (Is. lv. 1, 2, 3.) "As I live, saith the Lord, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his way and live: turn ye, turn ye from your evil ways, for why will ye die, O house of Israel" (Ez. xxxiii. 11.) "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest" (Matt. xi. 28.) "In the last day, that great day of the feast, Jesus stood and cried, saying, If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink" (John vii. 37.) "The Spirit and the bride say, come; and let him that hear-eth say, come ; and let him that is athirst come ; and whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely" (Rev. xii. 17.)

You must see that these invitations embrace all men. The ends of the earth are invited, by which we understand the vilest of the vile—the wicked are invited—the weary and heavy laden are invited—the thirsty are invited—and whosoever will come, are made welcome to come and take salvation's waters without money and without price. You cannot imagine any class or condition of men who are not fully embraced in these invitations, excepting the lost.

Now if there are some of our race for whom these blessings were never intended, then has God mocked the miseries of men, by inviting them to come and partake of blessings which he determined they never should enjoy. Who—who is prepared to bring such an accusation against the Lord of hosts ? Who is willing to face the LORD JEHOVAH with such an imputatoin upon his lips ?

6. But, in conclusion, we remark, that the fact of God having appointed a day of general judgment, goes to establish the doctrine for which we are now contending. When Paul stood in the midst of Mars Hill, before the Athenian Areopagus, he said, "God hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness, by that man whom he hath ordained, whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead" (Acts xvii. 31.) And Christ and all his apostles teach that we shall be judged according to our works.

The Saviour says, "All that are in their graves shall hear his voice and come forth ; they that have done good unto the resurrection of life ; and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation." How can this be reconciled with the doctrine of eternal and unconditional election and passing by ? If the eternal destiny of all men was unalterably fixed before the beginning of time, why judge the world ? Why does the good Lord teach us that we shall all be rewarded or punished according to our works, if our eternal doom was predetermined before we were born ? God has not thus dealt with his creature man. His promises and threatenings are all made in sincerity ; they mean what they say, and shall all be realized by every one according to his works. To those who by a patient continuance in well doing, seek for glory, honor, and immortality, he will give eternal life ; but unto those who are contentious, and obey not the truth, but obey unrighteousness, he will give tribulation and wrath. (See Rom. ii.)

Let all those, then, who have named the name of the Lord, be careful to depart from iniquity. O let us give all diligence to make our calling and election sure. Let us be careful to do his commandments, that we may have a right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city.

And to those who have not submitted to the law of Christ, we would say, COME. You may all become the elect of God by faith and obedience. O, then, fly to the Saviour while you may. Repent of all your past sins, forsake the evil of your ways, confess the Lord and Saviour before men, and be baptized in his holy name, and arise to walk in newness of life, and thus be added to the number of God's elect ; and then go on to add to your faith virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness, and charity, that an admittance may finally be administered unto you, into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

THE TREASURES OF GOD'S WORD.

WERE I a Queen upon the throne, with many subjects bowing at my feet—did I possess beauty and talents, and the wealth of the world—I would gladly cast them all away for the sweet privilege of being one of God's meek children. For this alone can afford great and unending happiness when all things else shall fail. The earth never has, nor ever will give us anything that it does not take again, and often, too, without an hour's warning. We may pore over the wisdom of sages, dwell upon the beauties of the poets, delight to look upon the paintings of earth's most celebrated artists—may love to dwell upon the many beauties of art—may love human nature in all its simplicity — may love the sweet-scented flowers, and think them emblematic of all that is good, pure, and holy — may admire the magnificent oaks of the forest, as they stand erect and beautiful — may stop to consider the sublime majesty of the ocean-waves — may listen to the music of little birds and murmuring rivulets, view the green and far-spreading plains, and notice the clouds which darkly veiled the sky passing away, leaving all calm and lovely ; but the mind soon wearies at the sameness. And were this all that we could do, all that we could think upon, life would be but a monotonous round of scenes and duties. But, thank Heaven, we have pleasures for the mind and heart beyond all these. It is found in the Word which God has kindly given us. What pleasure to derive devotion from the songs of David — to learn wisdom from Solomon — to learn unshaken confidence from Abraham and Noah, meekness from Moses, patience from Job — to learn hope and zeal, and how to bear affliction, from Paul, boldness from Peter, love from John — to find every good and lovely grace perfect and shining forth in the life of Jesus ; and to learn something of what we shall enjoy from the Book of Revelation. Here are pleasures deep and lasting, and possessing infinite variety. If we study many books — if we read Shakespeare, Milton, Longfellow, Macaulay, or Irving, there is still a desire for something which they cannot tell us. There is still a void in the mind. But if we read the Holy Scriptures, we find something to fill and satisfy the mind. Reading the Word does not make us weary, nor do its lessons grow old. Surely no hard or sage has ever taught such lessons, so fragrant with holy truth and purity, so sublime and beautiful — storing the mind with such treasures of thought, and imparting such bliss, as the dear blessed Bible to mortals given, revealing Him who is "the Light, the Life, the Way."

THE HUMILITY OF CHRIST.

JESUS came to seek and save the lost. The mission of the Saviour to our world was associated with mystery and wonder, and in all the experience of men nothing like it had transpired before. When warriors had visited other countries, they had only produced misery and death, and left their name and mission written in blood.

Should a king find it necessary to send an envoy to some foreign inferior court, or to some rude or barbarous part of his own distant possessions, and select his son as this envoy, he would throw around him the badge of royalty, and in pomp and splendor he would go, utterly despising those of inferior dignity, and resolving that his visit should be as brief as possible amongst the oi barbaroi, where he could find no congenial spirits. But how incomparable is the court which he might leave, to the court-royal which our Saviour left ; and how different the condescension of the king's son, who only stooped to communion with the chief of those whom he considered his inferiors ; and our Saviour, who came the lowest of the low, even a babe in the manger of a beast : yea, more, who could say. "The foxes have holes, and the birds have nests, but the Son of Man hath not where to lay his head !" But how different, too, is the stay of each. The king's son does not go there to remain, and his stay is brief. Even angel's visits are but for a moment : like the gentle breeze that fans our brow, they come and go. But not so with our Saviour. for He made his footstool his dwelling-place. He came not on a transitory visit, but to be a citizen of our world — to live in it for more than what is now an average life-time — to bear the fetters of cruelty — to be a servant of servants — to submit to scorn, and finally to endure death for a race of guilty rebels. In all this he had one great object in view, "To seek and save the lost."

HOLINESS.

Do you live it, every day, every hour ? Do others see it — witness it — acknowledge it ? You profess holiness — do you breathe it, speak it, pray it — do you live holiness, walk holiness ! Is holiness in you, over you, all about you ? Does holiness beam forth in your life, in every thought, look, word, action !

Do the words of your mouth, and the meditations of your heart indicate the doctrine you profess? Do you abandon, now and for ever, every appearance of evil? Is faith working by love, in you, continually?

Nothing so surely and speedily brings this blessed doctrine to perfect love into disrepute, as the inconsistent walk of its professors. And what a hindrance are these stumbling-blocks to those seeking the inner life, hungering and thirsting after this righteousness. Beloved, let us walk even as Christ walked. "Every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he that is pure."

"THE LIGHT OF LIFE"

LIGHT is a divine emanation. It is the glory of nature, and the vesture of God. It is pleasant to the eye, and alike the cause and revealer of beauty. It is a marvellous outpouring and overflowing from the centre of all purity. It is so great as to encompass and irradiate millions of worlds, and so minute as to illumine the pupil of an insect's eye. It is swift as the flight of an archangel, and unceasingly charioteers amidst the splendors and magnificence of the brilliant and immeasurable universe. Handmaid of God — first-born of creation — friend of the reptile — glory of the flowers — joy of the world. Beautiful as is light, it only reveals the exterior of things. A straw may hide its ray, and a prism will change it from its course. It flashes in the brightness of the stars. It is intangible and magnetic, and is invested with attractive and repulsive power. It is unceasing, essential, and healthful. It reveals to us wonderful and delicate proportions, and unveils to our view a part of the works of the Infinite Mind. While we are charmed and delighted with its revelations, we are sometimes subjected to the feelings of awe. Its brightness dazzles, its grandeur overwhelms. But what a poor thing is light, when compared with Him who is the light of life. There is a natural light for the body, and there is a spiritual light for the soul; and that light is concentrated in the Sun of Righteousness, without which the soul is enfolded in the habiliments of gloom. It is a light which shines into our souls — which searches out the thoughts and intents of the heart. There is no hidden part which it does not penetrate. It illumines every chamber, some of which are full of uncleanness and death. It flashes with divine power upon hidden and cherished sin, which is first exposed in all its horrid deformity, and then it is consumed by the intense fire of its love. It is a light which unfolds all the mysterious and complicated features, sympathies, and affections of the moral character, and reveals to us the deep and celestial things of the kingdom of God, which enables the trusting and hopeful spirit to wait until it shall be borne by the angels up to those holy spheres where darkness is not, and where there is no more death. That light of life influences and expands the intellectual power. It quickens his comparison, and he feels the spirit power of his celestial allegiance. It excites his causality, and unfolds to him, if but in dim outline, the deep and immeasurable purposes of the Eternal love. It arouses his locality, and he longs to fly away and be at rest. It excites the deep feelings of emotional song, and attunes the spirit to the high melodies of heavenly praise. It clears his vision, and gives him an enrapturing prospect of the fair fields of the Heavenly Canaan — of the saints clad in white — of the crowns which sparkle in the light of celestial love — and of the cherubim and seraphim who are for ever before the throne. It adorns and dignifies his language, turning it from the meanness and grossness of a world of sensuality, into that of purity of thought and sublimity of utterance, whereby every word becomes a spiritual symbol, and every sentence a song of praise.

In the view of this light, how poor and impotent is the otherwise magnificent and sublime science of Astronomy. The light of the heavens, which comes from all the golden censers of night, leads my admiring spirit through spheres of beauty and grandeur, and being borne upon the wings of thought, I am found upon a world which lies at the outskirts of creation, when my spirit broods in awe and solemn silence over, the dark eternal gloom. This is the sable environ of creation — this is the spot where

"Jehovah dropped his slackened line,
Laid his balance by, weighed worlds,
And measured infinite no more."

Here the last lingering ray has died away—here my spirit seems paralysed with the coldness and silence of the unsocial and fearful gloom. Here no sun illumines, no star twinkles, no planets wander, no comet appears — darkness and silence here without a rival reign. Not so with the light of the gospel. It is the full light of the glory of God in the person of Jesus Christ. It is the great central sun in the spiritual universe. It illumines with divine glory—it quickens into life, and through all the boundless powers of the soul it shines with undiminished splendour. Before it the terrors of death fly away, the darkness of heathenism is dispersed, cruelty and wrong perish—alcohol is driven back to his dark abode, while the fiend of slavery, with its whips and chains, and bloody scourges and private wrongs, is crushed and destroyed. By this light the false gods are utterly abolished, all the machinations of the kingdom of darkness are exposed, and the full revelations of salvation, and glory, and honor are made, to the joy of the church and the glory of heaven. Its light is commensurate with the requirements of humanity, and it reveals to us a prodigal world returning to its God. There is nothing so wonderful as the soul. It is great in its ruins. It possesses powers which its own consciousness cannot comprehend. Though fallen, it is not forsaken; though dead, by the light of revelation it is permeated with spiritual life. Even from the deep and immeasurable depths of its degradation, it evinces a power and a desire to rise up to the high conception of grasping infinite truth; and from its wonderful resources there are evolved a series of moral and mathematical truths which are eternal and cannot be changed. Such a soul, whose origin is traceable to the divinity of the Eternal, and whose sympathy, and compassion ally it to God, in order to bring it back to a state of reconciliation, required a Saviour, able and mighty to save. Its value made it worthy of the sympathy and the love of God; and thus the most stupendous sacrifice which heaven could make was made, in order to redeem it from the slavery of sin and the power of death. We can measure the distance of the sun, and call the stars by their names, but who can measure infinite love? Contemplate the mind in ruins—see the soul wrecked and stranded upon the shores of hell. Even then it is without a parallel, and there is nothing under the heavens which can be compared to it. Though it has lost its course — though adverse winds have blown—though it has been shorn of the robes of its purity—though its eye has lost the brightness of its celestial fire—by sin its faculties were not crushed; they were estranged from God, and perverted from the ways of truth. To disperse from it the darkness of sin, the Light of the World came, and in order that it might not be bound by the fetters of death, the Light of Life shone into its sepulchre and den of sin, to bring it forth amidst the rejoicings of the angels, as a spirit ransomed by the Pearl of Great Price. Our natural life is a blessing and a boon. How wonderful and exquisite in all its connections and affections! It intelligently connects us with a few of the things which are material, but what is it in comparison with our spirit-life? That which is quickened into a state of being by faith and obedience—that which is the gift of God through our Lord Jesus Christ—that which claims through the Great Sacrifice a right to the bliss of heaven — that upon which death can have no abiding power—this is the life which allies us to God, which is an earnest of our return to, and acceptance by, Him from whom we had departed, and against whom we had sinned. It is the soul shaking itself from the dust of death, and being by the grace of God invested with the robe of righteousness. It is a life which has no earthly connection. Though in this world the spirit is fallen, and around it the dark clouds of sin are gathered, we perceive in it a majesty which, while it excites our love increases our sorrow. Though fallen, consciousness, which in its nature is so mysterious, sits enthroned, and recognizes in its lowest form the individuality of our being, and with its higher power it rises up to the Eternal Throne. Reason, calm and profound, with its power to penetrate, analyse, and compare, hath her abiding place. The angel of hope, too, illumines the spirit, and gives it a prospect which pleases and excites; while the imagination treasures up its idealisms, and can find no limit to its wanderings. Love of self, of kith, and kin is there—the eye ranges the universe, and knowledge is treasured in the heart. In that fallen soul there are deep and profound thoughts, natural yearnings, and wonderful sympathies. To itself it is a miracle. It feels, too, that it is as impossible to comprehend itself, as it would be for it to create a world, or with an intelligent conception to grasp the infinite. God saw it in ruins, and with infinite mercy He bowed the heavens and came down to its help. Who can measure the love of God? Where, for such a purpose, are the instruments which the soul can use? Where can the love be found which is sufficiently intense, or the conception, however exalted, which shall be adequate, or the logic which shall comprehend the wonderful love of the Eternal? Boundless was the mercy, infinite was the compassion, wise and heavenly the scheme. The angels were approving witnesses to the soul-saving plan of salvation by the man Christ Jesus. What a mercy it is to believe in the gospel of liberty and truth! We hold the Bible to be the liberator of the human soul. Its truths connect the spirit with God. It teems with promises, and reveals to us the King's highway, which leads to the eternal city. It proclaims truths to the everlasting confusion of sects and parties. If I become a Wesleyan, I must believe in John Wesley, with his unscriptural conferences, his class meetings, his infant sprinkling, and his quarterly tickets. If I become a Quaker, I must make George Fox my model-man; I must not sing, I may be born a member, or attend it may be for five or seven years before I can become one. If I become a Swedenborgian, I must sell body and soul to the whims and conjectures of the great Swedish visionary. If I became a Mormon, I must commit myself to the fooleries of Joe Smith. If I become a Roman Catholic, I must be bound by a host of traditions, which not only have no foundation in truth, but are repulsive to humanity, and opposed to the plain teachings of the Word. If I become a member of the Protestant Church, as established by law, I experience a similar bondage. What a mercy it is to feel a release from all these errors! We live in the light of Him who is the light of life, and in that light we are looking forward to the time when in deathless glory we shall see Him as He is. J. I.

THE INVOCATION—"VERITAS" REVIEWED.

WHEN the beloved brethren shall have examined this subject as fully as they desire, it will gratify me to obtain permission from the esteemed Editor of the Harbinger, to present a summary of the whole subject. At present it will suffice to review the remarks of Veritas, adding a word for—"A. H."

For my own part, I cannot say that I intended my June article as a reply to the query which Veritas had offered on the cover of a previous number of the B. M. H. His query certainly hastened my writing again on the subject; but I could not bring myself to notice his question in any formal manner, because it really did seem a burlesque on the teaching and practice of any brethren to whom he can be supposed to have made reference. What brother amongst us, baptizing a convert, would think of saying or doing anything, "in order, by this means, to call on HIMSELF the name of the Lord?" This, at the time, appeared to me an attempt to make a thing look ridiculous by misrepresenting it! However, charity may plead that Veritas, in the wording of his query, did not say exactly what he meant.

Veritas now expresses his dissatisfaction with the replies he considers himself to have obtained, because they "assume 'calling on oneself the name of the Lord' as itself a specific action," &c. Now this remark might have had some propriety in it, if I had admitted that "calling on oneself the name of the Lord" is a correct version of the passages in question. Surely Veritas might have seen that I stoutly deny this; and that my June article was mainly intended to manifest the incorrectness of such a rendering. Let Veritas either manfully assail the Common Version, and answer the arguments offered in its defence, or else say whether that version does not present an idea "in itself specific!"

Veritas seems never to have perceived what was my object in referring to the circumstance, that whenever epikalesthai—calling upon—is in the New Testament construed with to onoma—the name—the latter is in the accusative case. This fact does not hold regarding many Septuagint passages, in which nevertheless invocation proper is self-evidently intended. My selection from the Septuagint was confined to those containing "the name" in the accusative, lest any person should say (though erroneously)—"These passages, having to onoma in the dative, are not to the point." I may yet have an opportunity of evincing that these are superlatively conclusive cases, but forbear at present. My object in presenting a group from the Greek O. T., containing none but instances of the same construction—viz. the same verb in the same voice, construed with the same noun in the same case—as that found in the N. T. group, was to make the fairness of my argument obvious to every merely English scholar! Was this "substituting" one case for another, or referring at all to Greek rules? Not having indulged in any substitution, of course I have departed from no rule—particular, general, or "universal." Veritas alludes with amusing facility to "the universal rule," but, as soon as he will instance the rule, and point out wherein I have departed from it, I shall know how to deal with him. At present, I cannot guess what, in all the world of grammar, he is wishing to be at.

Veritas next offers an exposition of Acts ii. 21; but as that exposition is based upon a mistranslation of the passage, it concerns me not to notice it until he will begin at the right place. I pass over this section, therefore, remarking only for the special benefit of Veritas, that when he has studied his Greek Testament and Grammar a little more, he will avoid such superficial remarks as—"This is in the genitive, and therefore proves so and so." To argue thus from the abstract case, without reference to the verbs and prepositions which govern those cases, is weak in the extreme!

Veritas, commenting on Acts xiii. 16, blunders at the outset, by observing—"Here remission of sins is placed in the genitive;" whereas, if he look again, he will find "wash away" in the imperative mode, and "thy sins" in the accusative case. Again, I ask, where is the logic in the following sentences:—"Now all admit that the name is the channel through which remission of sins is conveyed. [Quite true!] If so, baptism, or washing away sin, is the medium through which Paul called on himself the name of the Lord." Here is the mistranslation again! Besides, we don't all admit that baptism alone washes away sin: so far from it, none of us, I suppose, would affirm it. Ananias enjoins, baptism accompanied by invocation: it is thus the believer washes away his sins. The name is the channel; but the name is not appropriated by faith, repentance, confession, invocation, or baptism alone, but by all conjoined. Hence these sentences advance the cause of Veritas in no conceivable way.

"Besides," continues Veritas, "here are two participles, arising and calling upon; and two imperatives, baptize and wash away. [Quite correct, so far.] Now, if there be [why does not Veritas say "there is," if he believes it?] such a relation between them, as that the one [which?] explains the other [how?], it follows that Paul was commanded to arise in order to be baptized and wash away his sins, and both in order to call upon himself the name of the Lord, which is precisely the doctrine of Acts ii." Truly this is a marvellous jumble. Without criticizing these incoherent sentences as they deserve, let us try and guess the meaning of Veritas as well as we can. The only relation between imperatives and participles which I can imagine Veritas to intend, is that according to which some affirm, when an imperative is followed by a participle, the latter explains how the former is to be executed: as, "clean the house, sweeping it." Now could this relation be proved to be true as a general rule, it would lead to the very opposite conclusion to that desired by Veritas!

Veritas wishes to evince that we are to call upon the Lord's name by being baptized; but the only canon of interpretation (so called) to which I can conjecture he intends reference, would prove the opposite, viz. that we are to be baptized by calling upon the name of the Lord, which is absurd.

In truth, the only general rule I can find sustained by facts is this. A participle is necessarily a dependant, circumstantial word, requiring to hang, in an accessory manner, upon other and more leading words of a sentence: and hence, when depending on an imperative, either by preceding or following it, it may very naturally explain that imperative circumstantiality, by setting forth a preliminary, or accompaniment, or completion of the main action expressed in the imperative. The Lord's final commission furnishes an admirable illustration. This grand collocation of words contains one imperative—the leading word—and three participles depending on it, one preceding, and two following—“GOING,” “DISCIPLE,” “BAPTIZING,” “TEACHING!” Going is preliminary to the discipling; “disciple” is mainly executed by PREACHING (Mark xvi. 15, 16), but is not completed without “baptizing” the believer, and “instructing” the baptized to observe the “all things.” The law that a participle specifically and completely explains how the foregoing imperative is to be carried into effect, if applied to the Commission, lands in Pædobaptism. Other evidence could be offered of its falsity, but this I apprehend will be conclusive to the mind of Veritas. Let us see how it works in the commission. “Disciple nations:” that’s the work to be done. How is it to be accomplished? “Oh!” says this alleged canon, “the following participles show, just by (first) baptizing, and (secondly) teaching.” “Just our plan!” respond the Pædobaptists in triumph.” But the law is a false one; evidence of its falsity can be found on almost every page of the N. T. Let us open at random. Here’s a case in point, Col. iv. 5, “Walk in wisdom toward them that are without, redeeming the time.” Does the participle “redeeming” specifically and completely explain how the imperative, “walk,” is to be carried into effect? Clearly not. The wise walk includes many things besides the redeeming of time, but it does either include this, or require it as an accompaniment or a completion. So in a thousand instances.

Returning to the passage in hand, (Acts xxii. 16) it is now manifest that Veritas can no more make invocation consist in being baptized, or being baptized consist in arising; or, than a Pædobaptist can make discipling consist in baptizing and teaching. His argument (?) against invocation, incoherently stated, and timidly urged, collapses as soon as it is touched.

Here, then, stands this plain injunction: “Arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins, calling on the name of the Lord.” Or, still more exactly: “Having arisen, be immersed, and wash away thy sins, having called on his name.” The English language will not convey a more correct version.

But Veritas tries to enervate my use of the past participle, “having called,” by reminding me that “the whole words are in the first tense” [“past tense,” I presume he wrote, or meant to write.] Pity that my worthy opponent has no mercy on himself! I should like to see his attempt to translate an imperative in the past. Just fancy a command now given for something to be done in the past. Too many commands are not, alas, obeyed when given: Veritas would have them obeyed before they are given! Now, as the nature of the case suggests, when the Greeks employed imperatives that were past in their form, they could not do more than attach to them the meaning of an immediate and urgent PRESENT. It was otherwise with participles; these could be easily distinguished: “invoking” and “having invoked” can be discriminated. The celebrated Winer (Grammar of N. T. diction) after saying and shewing that “Strictly and properly, none of these tenses ever stands for another, as commentators pretend” (p. 279), expressly makes an exception supporting the foregoing remarks. These are his words: “In the significations above elucidated, the Tenses are used only in the Indicative and PARTICIPLE [!] In the other modes, that is, the Conjunctive, Optative, IMPERATIVE [!] the Aorist rarely denotes past time, but rapid accomplishment, or completion at once, without reference to any definite time” (p. 296.) The rule then is, that in the Imperative there is no definite reference to time, while in the Participle there is. Such being the case, while Veritas cannot render, understand, or apply "be baptized" and "wash away thy sins" in any other way than as denoting present duty—to be "rapidly accomplished," to be "completed at once"; I can and do insist, being sustained by law, on rendering the passage as I have done—"Be baptized and wash away thy sins, having called (or invoked) the name of the Lord." Here I am entrenched: let Veritas throw down my rampart!

The remarks of Veritas on Gal. iii. 27 are the merest trifling. It would be a waste of time to pretend any reply to them.

Regarding my quotations from the Old Testament, will every one read them over anew, and then the comments of Veritas on them, and say he has answered me—say he has not, under cover of a few vague generalities, perpetrated a most palpable and unworthy evasion. I ask again, Is there one of these passages which must denote surnaming (i. e. "calling on oneself the name"), and are there not several which cannot mean anything else than invoking? My argument cannot be met till a distinct and satisfactory answer be given to this question—it is impossible. The remark commencing, "When these are said to have called upon the name of the Lord, we understand," &c. might just as well, in point of argument, have gone on and ended thus:—"we understand—just anything we please which we can fancy connected in any way with the Lord's name—any thing we please, EXCEPT—just exactly THE act described as 'calling on the name of the Lord!'" Why, for instance, did not Veritas point out how his exposition can be harmonized with Nos. 3, 5, 7 of the group? Probably the reader can conjecture the reason.

To conclude, Veritas shews that he expects to be questioned some little as to what he means. Unfortunately, however, he does not seem to dream that any one would ask him, "Why do you render these passages, 'calling on ONESELF the name of the Lord?'" By what authority doest thou this thing? Nevertheless we persist in asking it. We have something to add on this head yet; but, meantime, surely it is reasonable to demand the reason why from those who alter our Common Version.

The pretence of Veritas that the (unauthorized) rendering "calling oneself by the name" contains something wonderfully profound is absurd. It means simply "to surname oneself by the name"—neither more nor less. There is not a syllable about "at the call of the Lord" in it. But some folks have a great objection to call a spade a spade. By the way, I should like to watch the face of Veritas while looking over a complete list of the 21 passages grouped in my June article, having in every case the clumsy "compound expression" proposed by Veritas inserted instead of the present rendering. It will look odd if he has got hold of the right meaning, and yet cannot put it into decent English. Or will he, perhaps, become reconciled to "surnaming?" Very good—then put that down in every passage—and now behold the picture!

If the world of good sense is "conquered" by such a style of exposition, then I have lost my reckoning.

A word for A. H. It may be perfectly true, that ordinarily prayer should be addressed to the Father through Jesus, but that does not annihilate those passages which command the invoking of the name of the Lord, nor rob Jesus of his Lordship. In John xvi. 23 Jesus changes the word employed with the most beautiful effect: "In that day ye shall enquire (erotao) of me nothing [as if you would learn something more perfectly.] Verily, verily, I say to you, Whatsoever ye shall ask (ai-teo) the Father in my name he will give you." See Trench's Synonyms of the N. T. Also the versions of Dr. G. Campbell and Alexander Campbell:—"On that day ye will put no questions to me." Hence, if A. H. will duly subordinate his "think so" to the divine word, he will find that this passage does not "settle the matter for ever," as he had supposed; but that Acts ii. 21, xxi. 16, Rom. x. 12-14, effect a most satisfactory contrary settlement.

NEW TESTAMENT PERIODS.—No. V.

FOURTH PERIOD.—THE FORTY DAYS.

JESUS lives again. He lives, the first fruits from the grave; but his work on earth is not yet done. He tarried a season on earth between his resurrection and glorification, to complete all that was necessary to be done by himself in person.

1. The apostles were his chosen witnesses—they were to be witnesses of his resurrection; and it was necessary that they should identify him after his resurrection. Hence he comes to them once, again, and often, during a period of forty days. They see him—they converse with him—they handle him. "By many infallible proofs," Luke informs us, he was made known unto them. They must deny clearest evidences addressed to human sense, if they disbelieve in his resurrection.

2. He imparted to them lessons during these forty days, which they were not prepared to receive before. The apostles were incompetent to understand the nature of his kingdom, or the nature of their own mission, until they were made acquainted with the great facts upon which it was based. These facts they never did believe till they occurred. I need hardly call the reader's attention to this, viz: that when Jesus before spake of his death, the disciples received it not. "Be it far from thee, Lord: these things shall not happen unto thee," expressed the mind of all who journeyed with him. Hence, when the Saviour did die, the disciples were unprepared for the event. And after his death, they had no hope of his resurrection—and when the "women" first spake of it to the disciples, "as they mourned and wept," it appeared unto them as "idle tales, and they believed them not."

It was evident, then, that being so utterly uninformed as to the basis of the remedial economy, during all the life of Jesus, they had not received instruction requisite to prepare them for their mission. With new insight into the work of their Master, they are prepared to receive nobler lessons than they had yet learned. As a teacher, the Lord opens anew a school in their midst. He turns back to the Law, the Prophets, the Psalms—opens up to them the Scriptures, and expounds to them those Scriptures concerning himself. He shows how the prophecies meet in him—how they reveal a child born—a man of sorrows, despised and rejected—whose life is taken from the earth—who is risen again to "abide for ever"—who is made a king to reign for ever, over a kingdom which shall have no end. What light now bursts upon their understandings! How enlarged their conceptions! They now behold a King eternal, not temporal: his throne in the heavens, not on earth; ruling over angels and men, not simply over Jews.

3. During this period he gave the great commission. This commission is based upon his work and triumph. As we have before seen, he overcame the world and conquered death, and when this work was completed, then was given to him "all power." Now this "all power" becomes the great promise of salvation. "All power in heaven and in earth is given unto me; go ye, therefore," &c. Significant language! Jesus is the sovereign of earth: all things are given into his hands; and now he chooses to send out a message—a message with salvation in it. It is not for the Jew as such—not for the Greek as such—but for sinners as such—to "all nations"—to "every creature"—to "all the world." Let it be remembered, 1st, That this is the first message of pardon and peace ever sent to "every creature;" 2nd, It is the only one that reaches down to our time. In short, it is the only message, with salvation in it, that is broad and enduring enough for us, of the nineteenth century. The only commission which began, and continues, and shall continue, during the entire reign of favor.

God had specially spoken to Patriarchs in the patriarchal age; but not one of them was authorized to preach a salvation to "the world." He gave a "law" through Moses: but it was for Israelites only. When John the Baptist came, he preached only to Jews. God sent him to none others. When Jesus sent out the twelve and seventy, he forbade—"Go not into the way of the Gentiles: into any of the cities of the Samaritans enter ye not." He, himself, was "a minister of the circumcision," and was "not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." But when his suffering life was over, and his resurrection triumph awarded him all dominion, he gave to Galilean fishermen—what none had received before them—the great universal commission—"Go into all the world." Here is the true stand-point from which to study salvation. The well-instructed scribe will never go back of the "all authority" vested in Jesus to learn the sinner's or the saint's duty. We must begin here. Here is something applicable to you, to me, to all. Here, too, are the terms upon which salvation is offered. It begins with the sinner, and through faith, repentance, and baptism, inducts him into the awful names of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, promising him, in this transition, the full remission of all past sins. To the disciplined and saved, it gives "all things" requisite to be observed in that state, such as Jesus had formerly taught his disciples, and which should be brought to their remembrance by the Holy Spirit. It is a full commission, answering the demands of that age, and of all days, even to the end of the world. It is the one only and final proclamation of remission under the reign of Jesus; nor will there be another. This commission is great, from the great character who gave it—from the great authority which backed it—from its great extent—from the great design in giving it—man's salvation, and ultimate glorification. Its terms are also great. Jesus is like himself, in what he is, in what he does, in what he commands us to do. Yes, there is a moral greatness and dignity in the unwavering faith, the tearful repentance and the solemn baptism of the poor sinner: for here he first steps upon holy ground. He feels the awe of the Divine presence, and the awful authority of the invisible and eternal Sovereign of angels and men envelopes him. And in connection with this authority there is no mere rite; for the name of Father, Son, and Spirit are there inscribed. His mind is not upon an act, or upon the element in which it is performed; but upon the awful and significant names and authority with which they are associated. And so it is a great duty. The Divine and Infinite Mind can no more command a non-essential, than it can trifle with mortals in promising a nonentity.

But whither are we wandering? Let the reader fill up what is lacking here. The work of Jesus is done. At the end of forty days, near to Bethany, on the Mount of Olives, he stands with his disciples. He converses with them—he raises his hands and blesses them; and while the sweet words of blessing still fall from his lips, a bright cloud comes and begins to bear him away. In silence they "gaze steadfastly" upward till he is lifted beyond the range of natural vision. The spell is broken by a voice—they are in the company of angels: "This same Jesus who is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven."

They return to Jerusalem, not weeping and terrified as when the Master died, but with a calm and holy joy. The Saviour is gone, but his blessing lingers with them; the words of the angels have made a holy impression; they have seen, as it were, the way into the heavens, and they remembered the words of the Master, "If I go away and leave you, I will come again and receive you to myself;" and they remembered that he had said, "I will not leave you comfortless—ye shall have peace." They remembered, too, how he had said, "Tarry in Jerusalem till ye be endued with power from on high." With minds expanded by lofty thoughts, full of hope and joy, they return to Jerusalem, to tarry in seclusion, till from heaven the signal should be given for them to astound the sleeping world with the intelligence of the Nazarene's resurrection and glorification.

Meanwhile this tarrying season must claim attention; for there is no little importance to be attached in this short interval of one week.

NO. VI.—FIFTH PERIOD: THE ONE WEEK.

In an upper room in the great city of Jerusalem sit the eleven apostles, in company with one hundred and nine disciples, male and female. The assembly is characterized by "prayer and supplication," and "great joy." Apart from this, so far as the record shows, the choosing of Matthias to supply the place from which Judas fell, fill up the transactions of the apostles during the brief tarrying season.

In the meantime, Christ has a work to do (if we must so speak) in the heavens. And he must be coronated. He went away from earth to "receive a kingdom." The regal crown must be placed upon his head. In order to a kingdom there must be a king; and with a king are associated a throne and a crown. Jesus was not crowned till he was glorified, and he was not glorified on earth. In the heavens he was constituted "Lord and Christ." He is crowned and enthroned. Now the degree goes forth—"Worship him all ye angels!" The sons of light bow the knee and confess their King. He that is worthy the homage of angels, how worthy the adoration of men! The Christian's kingdom has a crowned King. Jesus is that King. Hence the great error in supposing that this kingdom was in existence before his coronation in the heavens.

Again, we observe, that during the time in which the disciples were tarrying at Jerusalem, the great sin-offering was made. As the high priest, under the former covenant, slew the victim for a sin-offering "without the gate," and then brought its blood, not only into the temple, but into the very "Holy of holies"—the most sacred of all sacred places on earth, and where Jehovah was said to dwell—so Christ was slain on earth, and bore our sins (as typified by the "scape-goat") on the cross, and afterward entered "into heaven itself"—the Holy of holies of this universe—with his own blood, and made the one sin-offering, and thus became "the author of eternal salvation." In his death he put away the former institution, and the sin-offering belonging to that institution; and this was done that no sin-offering of divine appointment should be in force at the time that he should make an offering for sin.

It was therefore meet that the apostles should not begin their work of preaching "repentance and remission of sins" to the nations, through his blood, till this offering was made. Hence the waiting at Jerusalem. When we consider that the great work of Jesus, in order to our salvation, was consummated in the heavens, and not on earth, we cannot but be impressed with the certainty of men to err, who, in the progress of the Divine History, presume to find the plan of redemption before it is wrought out. In redemption we have "a new and living way" into the heavens, consecrated by the blood of Jesus. It was "after that the philanthropy of God, our Saviour, toward man appeared" that the means of salvation, peculiar to the New Covenant, were in force. How blindly leading the blind do men grope, who find the "new way" before Jesus marked it out and "consecrated" it!

We pause here. Our King is crowned—our Priest has officiated—all things are ready. Meanwhile the tidings of an accepted offering must be borne to earth—the waiting disciples must receive the signal. For this purpose a messenger must be sent to earth. It is a great message—may we say, earth never received a greater. Angels had foretold a Saviour's birth—angels proclaimed to shepherds a Saviour born—angels announced his resurrection—and angels stood by the disciples when Jesus ascended, and spoke of his coming again—but no angel is commissioned for the work of making known to earth the coronation and intercession of Jesus. The Holy Spirit is chosen. His work is to announce these facts, and justify Jesus in a world where he had been condemned and slain. Jesus had said that his kingdom would come with power; and he also told his disciples that they should "receive power after that the Holy Spirit had come upon them." For this the disciples waited, and for a brief period lisped not to the world a syllable of the great facts with which they were fully acquainted.

REQUIREMENTS OF THE CHURCHES.—No. VIII.

EFFORT.

VERY well, indeed, do we know the Master's will as to the diffusion of his truth. Never perhaps since the primitive age of the faith, when all the brethren went everywhere preaching the word, has it been so well understood as now with us, that it is the duty and privilege of every disciple to make known, as far as he can, the word of the truth of the gospel. So fully recognized is this amongst us as a principle of Christian ministry, that we almost feel as if there were nothing further to teach the brethren on the subject. It is so distinctive a principle with us, that scarce a passage is to be found in the Sacred Writings bearing on the subject with which the churches are not familiar. To remind the brethren that the church is the pillar and stay of the truth, the light of the world, the salt of the earth, a city set on a hill which cannot be hid, and that it is theirs to hold forth the word of life, to tell forth the perfections of Him who hath called them out of darkness into His marvellous light, to contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints, and to strive together with one mind for the faith of the gospel, may be to stir up their pure minds by way of remembrance, but not to teach them in the sense of informing them of what they do not already know.

How comes it, then, that with all requisite, if not with all possible knowledge, there is not the maximum, but the minimum, of individual effort put forth by the brethren generally? Each does not as much, but as little as he can: many do positively nothing. We say many, for though in most of the congregations there be a few active brethren, still in nearly all of the churches the vast majority of the brotherhood remains as inactive as in the popular one-man-system churches. Nay, worse than this: for we have before us the undeniable fact, that in many congregations where a human order holds the sway, there is incomparably more general individual endeavor than there is among those so much better informed, and so much more responsible.

Brethren, these things ought not so to be. They are a disgrace to any people, and most of all to those who confess that they are not their own, that they are bought with a price, that they are constrained by the love of Christ, that he died for them that they should no longer live unto themselves, but unto him who died for them and rose again.

We confess that we are disposed to look on this as a grave and crying evil, which must be amended if the churches are to fulfil their glorious mission. There is no use in either covering or denying

it. It is too patent — too public for either. And even though it were not so manifest, still it is not our part to defend what is, but what ought to be. If we are true to our Captain, we will not follow the sectaries whose policy it is to defend their sect, but the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. We have never said—See what we have done, are doing, and shall do; but we do say—See, there is God's truth, behold what it is and can do, what it has done in past ages and might do in ours. We have said, and we do say with all confidence—See, there is what is written; but we have not ventured to say—We shall succeed in establishing what is written. So far as by the grace of God we have been enabled so to do, we have no objection that it should be looked at and compared with the pattern given in the book; but it is one thing to do this, and quite another to say—Behold us, follow us. It were well, however—and this is what we should aim at, and this is the drift of our present paper—that our practice be so parallel with our principles, as that we should indeed be living epistles of Christ, known and read of all, that the people should be compelled to take knowledge of us that we have been with Jesus—that our action should demonstrate, not merely the practicability of the Lord's own order of his house, but of its immense superiority over all and sundry human schemes.

Of this we have no more doubt for ourselves, than we have that the sun is greater and better than any light man can invent. But what is needed is a practical demonstration of the incalculable superiority of Bible order to human order. When we say a practical demonstration, we do not mean that the brethren themselves be better instructed in the will of God, more established in the faith of Jesus, and further comforted in the hope of the kingdom, than are the adherents of popular teachers. This we know they are. For our part we would not give a year of mutual Bible study and exhortation, for a life of popular sermon hearing. Our meaning is, that each do daily what he can in making known the truth to others. Whether in thinking, reading or writing, giving a tract or lending a book, each can and ought to do something every day for the furtherance of the truth. And however little, yet if it be done daily, and by all, the result could not fail to be great and glorious.

It is not so much that brethren be made to know, but to feel, that this is their duty and privilege. They all know that the exhortation which speaks to them as unto children, says : "Son, go work to-day in my vineyard." They know that this is a command which requires a daily practice ; and what they need is to feel this, and feeling it, to make it a habit of their life to do something every day for the salvation of the perishing and the service of the Saviour. It is the many littles which in most great enterprises produce the grand result. It is among those who can say of their work, We are all at it, and always at it, that much is accomplished. God has taught us this in nature, and as plainly so in grace. It was doubtless the going of the brethren everywhere preaching the word, and their striving together with one heart and soul for the faith of the gospel, that contributed in no small degree in the first age, to the mighty prevalence of the evangel of Jesus. Not only then, but in every age since, in which there has occurred any remarkable advance of the truth, the people, not the priests, have carried it to victory. Our own age is no exception, for whether we look to Germany and see there the hundreds of brethren engaged as volunteer preachers, teachers, tract distributors, and colporteurs ; or to America, and view the rapid spread of the recent awakening, through the spontaneous action of earnest, though non-official, and good, but mistaken men ; or to our island home, and trace the similarity of the rise and progress of what is mistakenly called the revival, we find that, as a general rule, individual spontaneous movement has given birth and growth to whatever has been achieved. We cannot but conclude, therefore, that with the far superior amount of divine truth we have to inspire and guide us, we ought to be more than conquerors. But it is not the mere knowing or holding of any amount of truth that will convert the world : it is the telling forth and holding forth that will do the work. It is not the having, but the using the park of artillery, that will break the squares of the foe.

To work, then, at once, every one who has enlisted into the ranks of the Captain of Salvation ; and let it be a matter of conscience, of gratitude, and of pleasure, that you are counted worthy now to labour, so that in a little while you may enter into rest, assured that your works shall follow you, and procure for you, by the grace of your Sovereign Saviour, an ineffable and eternal reward.

INDIVIDUALITY OF CHRISTIANITY.

WE are not aware of any command which is to be obeyed by Christians in the aggregate. All the requirements of Christianity are made to rest upon the Christian as an individual. That he is bound to co-operate with his fellow Christians in the work of his Master, is very clear ; but the command thus to co-operate is addressed invariably to each individual Christian, and each will be separately held responsible to God. There is no relation between two individuals so close as to enable one to obey God for the other. Each must believe, repent, confess, and continue in the faith for himself.

It is well said that "in union there is strength," and in a certain sense, this is true of every enterprise ; but we are very sure that next to the Almighty arm, upon which the church must ever lean for support, the piety, zeal, and activity of the individual members form the strongest pillar that stays the fabric of Christianity. It is a great fault of the times that we accustom ourselves to look away from our personal efforts in the work of converting the world, to the supposed greater efficiency of aggregate movements. We are too apt to lose sight of what is required of ourselves individually, in our anxiety to push forward what others seem to be doing. We, as a people, have been laboring to break down the distinctions which have sprung up in the midst of God's heritage, and to elevate all Christians to one common level in Christ Jesus. We consider every Christian to be a king and a priest, and that every one who has put on Christ is called to preach the Word, and within the scope of his ability to officiate at the altar. Ability and opportunity are the only conditions of difference among Christians. God knows no other difference among men, the very greatest of whom is but a pigmy in his sight. If we could ever induce the individual Christian to place a proper estimate upon his dignity, importance, and efficiency in the kingdom of Christ, we should consider ourselves as having done more for the furtherance of the Master's cause, than can ever be accomplished by all the magnificent schemes for aggregate effort that have ever been born of the busy brain of man.

The Christian church has no head upon earth. Its head is in the highest heavens. The body on earth is composed entirely of members, all equal in the eye of God, each alike bound to perform whatever he can in the service of the Great Ruler of the kingdom. Among these members there must be unity; but it is that unity which springs from each being united to Christ as a common centre.

The recognition of a personal, or individual faith in Christ, as the ever present head in his church, is what is so much wanted in these days of doubt and religious scepticism. Conversion to a person, love and obedience to a person, and that person none other than the Son of God, is the demand made by the Holy Spirit in the Oracles of His truth and love, upon all who profess to be the followers of Jesus. We fully sympathize with Bro. D. Oliphant, in the following statement which he publishes on the foregoing article.

For years our reflections have run in the same direction upon the points handled by our contemporary. We are thoroughly convinced that the Papalism of Protestantism will not be broken to atoms until we all learn the individuality, as well as the fraternity and unity, of the Lord's religion.

So greatly has the associative element been degraded and turned from its divine purpose, that more frequently than otherwise, we find compacts of men who will share and divide responsibility in doing what they would studiously avoid, or perchance, utterly detest, as individuals.

When a man becomes a member of a compact with ninety-nine others, and feels that the responsibility of action is divided into a hundred fractions, and he only responsible as the hundredth part of the whole, or perhaps not responsible at all by reason of others who have "influence," he may be a pleasant sort of a fellow, and a fine churchist, but how he can be a disciple of Jesus at this rate, is one of the questions.

There is a twofold excellency in the Christian government unknown to every other. It is a double empire. There is a government for the individual as such, with sanctions and behests as though he was the Adam of the world; and each man thus governed is, from the fact of being so governed, united to every other man under the heavenly government. Thus there is in Christ an empire of individuality and an empire of unity. Each disciple is a royal or kingly priest—he is also a working part of Christ's assembly compared to a body. Lack of acquaintance with the nature and bearings of the individual element, enters largely into the composition of sectarian anarchy; the abuse of the associative law gives us popery. May we not say that Protestantism will be turned to Christianity, and Papalism be put into the pit without a bottom, so soon as these two chapters relative to individual and associational obligation shall be practically understood?

WORDS FROM THE WORK TABLE—No. V.

"Walk worthy of the Lord." There is a widely prevailing idea that this cannot be done—that all our words and deeds are necessarily sinful—that our righteousness is, and must be, but as filthy rags. But God gives no impossible command—no injunction that we cannot comply with, and, in all the pages of the Bible nothing is more strongly urged, than that we press forward to perfection.

To the Colossians Paul wrote of their faith in Christ and their love to all the saints, and he prayed that they "might be filled with the knowledge of his will, in all wisdom and spiritual understanding ;" and that they "might walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing, being fruitful in every good work, and increasing in the knowledge of God." To the Thessalonians he wrote, "Ye know how we exhorted, and comforted, and charged every one of you, as a father his children : that ye would walk worthy of God, who hath called you into his kingdom and glory." He also besought the Ephesians to "walk worthy of the vocation wherewith they were called ;" then, after dwelling upon the compactness of Christ's body, the putting off the old man and putting on the new, he commanded them to "be followers of God as dear children." To Timothy the same apostle wrote—"Continue thou in the things which thou hast learned and hast been assured of, knowing of whom thou hast learned them, and that from a child thou hast known the Holy Scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus. All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness ; that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works." And his closing prayer to the Hebrew Christians was—"That the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make them perfect in every good work to do his will, working in them that which is well pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ." His final exhortation to the Corinthians is—"Be perfect—be of good comfort—be of one mind—live in peace, and the God of love and peace shall be with you." And the Great Teacher himself said—"Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father in heaven is perfect."

We are, then, plainly commanded to strive after perfection. God in issuing His edicts, places the means within our reach. When He says, "Be ye saved ;" He has already provided a sacrifice and a Saviour. When He says to the saved, "Be ye perfect ;" He has furnished an armory from whence they can procure all they need for the spiritual warfare. Then how dare some say, we cannot achieve what God commands ?

Let us not forget that sanctification is progressive. Losing sight of this causes us to shrink back, feeling—who is equal to it? We are born into the kingdom of God's dear Son, we are newborn babes, as such we have to feed upon the sincere milk of the Word, and to grow thereby ; first youth, then manhood, then the full stature of the perfect man. God requires not from the babe the perfection that should adorn the sire, but step by step we are to press forward, living so "That each to-morrow Find us farther than to-day."

"Since ye, then, be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God. Set your affections on things above ; and not on things on the earth. Put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness. Know ye not, that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ, were baptized into His death? Therefore, we are buried with Him by baptism into death, that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life."

Is this new life sufficiently manifested? I have heard of an aged minister who, on receiving a young convert, told her that Christianity ought to change her whole deportment ; every action should be marked by a difference, even the simple opening or shutting of a door, should be characterized by Christian grace. Do converts feel this—do they recognize their separation from the world—do they put off the old man with his deeds, and no longer seek to conform to the world? What outward change do we find in those that have been buried with Christ in baptism into death? Let us look to ourselves, and ask—How much difference is there in us?

The great requirement underlying all others is love—love to God and to man. Surrendering to Christ, drinking into His Spirit, will complete the abnegation of self. Self forgotten or conquered, then how easy are the various commands. Servants obey your masters—Masters give unto your servants that which is just and equal—Children obey your parents—Parents provoke not your children—Do unto others as you would they should do unto you—Love as brethren, be pitiful, be courteous, not rendering railing for railing, but contrariwise, blessing.

Christ is our exemplar—we are to follow in his steps, and He went about doing good. The world is to be the better for our existence. We were not created simply for our own pleasure, but to aid in the grand work of elevating and happifying humanity. We may have but one talent, but it is to our peril if we hide it in the earth. None need stand useless; there is work for every one. So long as there is ignorance to remove, want to relieve, sorrow to soothe, not one need stand a listless gazer on the world's great field. Our Saviour was ever engaged in work which would benefit the world—His own ease was never regarded—He was ever occupied in His Father's work. We are to drink into this self-denying spirit—we are to make every action amenable to Christ—we are to do all things for him—our household labour, our business, our pleasures, are all to have reference to Him. Every day should be a day of willing service to the Lord. In this way only can we walk worthy of the Lord.

"God crowneth no divided heart;
To Him, oh hallow all thy life!
Who loveth Jesus but in part,
He works himself much pain and strife,
And gains what he deserveth well,
Here conflict, and hereafter hell.
Press on!

"Let not the body dull the soul,
Its weakness, fears, and sloth despise;
Man toils and roams from pole to pole
To gain some earthly fleeting prize.
The Highest Good he little cares
To win, or striving soon despairs.
Press on!

"Oh, help each other, hasten on,
Behold the goal is nigh at hand;
The battle-field shall soon be won.
Your King shall soon before you stand!
To calmest rest He leads you now,
And sets his crown upon your brow.

DOUBTINGS.

THE minister doubts, and the people doubt. They were born doubting, educated in doubts, grew up in doubts, became rooted and grounded in doubts. Then, of course, it's doubt, doubt, doubt! They speak doubtfully, pray doubtfully, go about day after day in doubts. Everything they do spiritually is done on the principle and practice of doubt: they are doubts without, doubts within, doubts to-day, doubts to-morrow—so on to the end. They live doubtfully and die doubtfully. Only a few evenings since we attended a meeting of doubts: nearly all present were doubters. The presiding minister himself was a doubter, encouraged doubting—he doubted, and of course the people doubted. "Like priests, like people." Thus the meeting went on in doubts till the close—it was doubt in the beginning, doubt in the ending—the meeting went on in doubts, and broke up in doubts; every one, doubtless, retired doubting, conversed on the way home doubtfully, retired to rest on doubts, slept on doubts, rose up on doubts.

Friends, what think you of this doubting process?—this being born in doubts, living and breathing in doubts, preaching, praying, exhorting in doubts, living and dying in doubts? If we live a whole life on doubts and doubting, what surety have we of not dying in doubts, and doubting on, for ever and for ever in doubts? A beloved brother in the meeting of doubts alluded to said, "He always had doubts, expected always to doubt, always to have doubts;" he commenced his testimony doubting, and ended it doubting, and no doubt he will leave the world doubting. Beloved, is not the thought fearful? Is there anything in God's Word to substantiate this doctrine of doubts, or the least intimation given of it being well-pleasing in the sight of heaven? What is the influence of a church of doubters on the world?—on the minds and hearts of sinners? What is the conclusion of the impenitent on hearing these doubters expressing their doubts, with long faces, and their heads bowed like a bulrush?

Is the gospel a failure? Has Christ died in vain? We read, and impenitent sinners read in God's book, that religion is happifying, purifying—that it makes us hopeful, cheerful, joyful—that the gospel is good news, glad tidings of great joy—that Jesus Christ is a great Saviour, glorious, mighty, perfect, complete—one that can save to the uttermost, from all sin, all doubtings and fearings. Now, ye doubters, by your doubtings, what do ye do but give the lie to all this?—stab the very vitals of God's truth! Still more, you bring an evil report upon this goodly land, discouraging the people. How can you possibly dishonor God more than by this doubting? What sin more aggravating in the sight of heaven than this unbelief? And doubting is unbelief, and unbelief is doubting, a sin of all others the most damning! It makes God a liar! We have no more right to doubt than we have to swear falsely, steal, take God's name in vain, commit adultery, murder, or highway robbery—God forbids it. And still you flatter yourselves this doubting is quite harmless—even commendable—a sure mark of grace, modesty, and humility. Was ever blindness so preposterous, so heaven-daring? There is not the slightest shade of apology in the Bible for doubting. There is no sin Christ and his apostles rebuked so frequently and so severely, as this same sin of doubting or unbelief. Friends, doubting friends, what do you gain personally by these doubtings? Are you strengthened by them—built up in your holy faith by these doubts—are they refreshing to your soul? Rather do not these doubtings weaken the whole man? Is not this doubting a gangrene of the soul, a leprosy, a plague, a palsy? It eats out the life-blood of Christian hope and usefulness. A man that is always doubting his own salvation, is unprepared to point others confidently to "the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world." "Physician, heal thyself," presses upon him like an incubus; his heart faints within him, and one faint heart makes other faint hearts—one faint hearted soldier on the eve of battle strikes fearfulness into a whole army, and defeats the battle. This is why God commanded Gideon to say to all the doubters or fearful ones in his army, "depart," till the whole number numbered only three hundred, and with these few whole-souled, courageous ones, the whole Midianitish army were routed, and a complete conquest gained.

This doubting has been the curse of ages. The Israelites, by one single act of doubting, were for ever excluded the promised land, and left to perish in the wilderness.

The command is everywhere, "Be of a good courage, be strong in the Lord and in the power of his might." Then "one can chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight." But what saith God to the doubting, "the fearful, the unbelieving?"

WHAT ARE THE MARKS OF A TRUE DISCIPLE?

THERE are some satisfactory tests of this question, and a few having passed in review before my mind, in the course of my reading, I would present them, through you, for the benefit of myself and all others whom it may concern.

Ask our Lord for a mark of a true disciple, and his reply is in few words, short and full: "If ye love me, keep my commandments." "If you consult Paul on the same point, he will say, "As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God;" and "the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance—against such there is no law." If you ask John, who seems to have written a good part of his first epistle on purpose to confute some of his own time, who vainly boasted of being born of God, while they took no pains to maintain good works; if you consult him he will tell you, "Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin;" and, "in this the children of God are manifest, and the children of the devil: whosoever doeth not righteousness is not of God." The man is known by his heart and life, tried by the rule of God's commandments. These are unerring, infallible marks; marks which every good Christian has, and every bad one wants. But if any scruple should remain about the application of the rule to every one's conscience (because we have all of us infirmities, and "in many things we all offend,") the safest rule whereby to judge of our own particular state, I conceive to be this—if we sincerely take care to do the best we can, are daily gaining ground of our vices and our passions, and find ourselves, after the strictest examination, to be upon the improving hand, then we may comfortably believe that our regeneration has been salutary and entire, and that we are in a state of grace and salvation.

But above all things, ought we to beware of ever trusting to inward feelings, secret impulses, or the like, as marks of a good state, until we have thoroughly tried and examined them by the unerring rule of God's written word. What are any impulses, considered barely in themselves, but some strong inclinations, motions, or affections, which men feel in their breasts, and cannot presently distinguish from the natural workings of their own minds? But suppose them by their unusual strength, or warmth, or their uncommon manner of affecting us, to impart something supernatural or extraordinary, (we make the supposition, not affirming that supernatural motions are, in these days, not distinguished) then consider that there are evil spirits to tempt and deceive, as well as a good spirit to enlighten and sanctify; and there is no certain way of knowing (without well considering the nature and tendency, the justice or injustice of what we are moved to) from whence the impulse cometh. Judas probably had a strong impulse upon him to betray the Lord, for Satan had entered into him. What fair colours the tempter might lay before him, to calm a rebuking conscience, and whether he might not persuade him, that it would be only giving our Lord an opportunity of setting forth His divine power and glory in his own rescue, is more than we can certainly know. But self-flattery is apt enough to invent or to lay hold on soft colorings and good meanings; and there is scarce any wickedness whatever, but what is capable of being so varnished by a subtle understanding. Ananias was, perhaps, another instance of strong impulses moving him to "lie to the Holy Spirit;" Satan had "filled his heart." He also might have been deceived by good meanings, such as the tempter had artfully suggested, and thrown as mists before his eyes. But the thing was evil in itself, and he ought to have known it. It is certain that the persecutors of the church of Christ, some of them at least, had a very good meaning in it, "thinking to do

God service by it;" yet nobody can doubt but that therein they acted wickedly, and we have warrant sufficient from the general rule of Scripture to say, that they were moved and actuated by Satan in what they so did, though with a zeal for God, and a pious intention to serve him. Therefore it is exceedingly dangerous to trust either to warm impulses or to godly intentions, without first strictly inquiring into the nature of the acts, and into the lawfulness of the means to be made use of for compassing the end aimed at. If any man "does evil that good may come," he is a transgressor; it is acting wickedly for God, and dishonoring him most highly in attempting to serve him by sin. Pious intentions or godly aims will never bear a man out in unwarrantable practices. The end must be good, and the means also, or else the action is wicked, and the man an ungodly man.

There is no safe rule to go by but the rule of right reason, in conjunction with God's written Word. By these every impulse must be scanned and tried, both as to end and means, before we can pass any certain judgment on it, whether it come from Satan or from the Spirit of God. If God in the soul (as some term it) commands anything contrary to God in the Bible, then may we be assured that it is not the God of heaven that does it, but the "God of this world," which sometimes "blinds the minds of them that believe not, lest the glorious gospel of Christ should shine upon them." Great care should be taken not to invert the right order of things—not to begin at the wrong end. Say not, we are favorites of heaven, we have the Spirit; therefore our hearts are right, and our ways good: for that would be drawing a very precarious conclusion from dark and disputable premises; but say rather, our hearts are right, and our ways good, and therefore we have the Spirit. For he that is led by the Spirit, and walks by the written rules of the Spirit, he, and he only, can, upon sure grounds, say that he has seen the Spirit. And when he can say it, let him say it to himself and to God (whom he ought to thank for so inestimable a blessing,) and let him not rashly boast of it before the world, nor censoriously judge or despise others; for that would be directly copying after the proud Pharisee.

and would infallibly quench the spirit. Common modesty and decency, and above all, our common Christianity, forbid all such boasting of the ordinary graces, which would amount to the same as blazing it abroad. How pure, how holy, how righteous we take ourselves to be above others! Neither will it avail us in such cases to urge that we know it, and that we thank God for it, ascribing nothing to ourselves; for did not even the proud Pharisees do the same when he said, "God, I thank thee, that I am not as other men are."

Christianity is an humble, quiet, peaceable, and orderly religion; not noisy or ostentatious, not assuming or censorious, not factious or tumultuous. They who think otherwise of it are altogether strangers to it, and know nothing yet as they ought to know of the life and spirit of true Christianity.

OPEN COUNCIL

WAS THE CRUCIFIXION ON FRIDAY?

I PRESENT the following considerations in favor of a negative to this important query, with mingled feelings of hesitation and confidence: hesitation, when I look at the mighty array of learning leagued in support of the affirmative view — confidence, when I look simply at the evidence before me; not lessened, I might perhaps say, by a knowledge of the immense interests involved in the maintenance of "Good Friday," where human infallibility rears its head above the written word. It is well known, that on the point now before us, the integrity of the Scriptures has been often challenged: the solution of the difficulty must therefore be regarded as of great importance. If it can be shewn that the present belief in Friday, as the day of the crucifixion, is without a scriptural foundation, we shall take out of the hands of the sceptic a powerful weapon, and relieve many sincere minds of considerable discomfort. I ask the brethren not to take anything I advance for granted, but calmly to weigh the evidence, point out where it is defective, and kindly assist in the further investigation of the subject. I should wish it to be understood that the following positions are merely suggestive.

1. Whatever ambiguity may attach to the expressions, "on the third day," and "after three days," we are bound to say of Mat. xii. 40, that no language could more definitely convey the idea of three diurnal revolutions than the "three days and three nights" used by the Saviour to express the period of his incarceration in the tomb. "For as Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so shall the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth."

2. If the burial of the Lord took place on Friday, and he rose early on Sunday morning, he was only in the heart of the earth two nights, one day, and part of another day.

3. And therefore it follows, that if there be any passage in the New Testament, in which we are decidedly shut up to the conclusion, that the crucifixion and burial took place on Friday, a manifest contradiction is before us. The prediction to this day remains unfulfilled.

4. But we submit that the following passages, viz. Mark xv. 42, Luke xxiii. 54, 1 John xix. 31, on which the Friday theory mainly rests, do not serve as a foundation for that theory. The assumption is, that the seventh day Sabbath is spoken of in these passages, as succeeding the day of preparation, whereas the day following the feast of the Passover was called a Sabbath, (and in relation to the Passover the Sabbath) on whichever day of the week it might fall. The 14th Nisan was the feast of the Paschal lamb, and commenced when the sun went down upon the 13th. The 15th Nisan was the feast of unleavened bread, and commenced at sunset of the 14th. On this day no servile work was to be done. See Lev. xxiii. 5-7.

That certain days in the various annual festivals were called Sabbaths, see Levit. xxiii. 24, 32-39. The preparation mentioned by the several Evangelists must have consisted in doing all needful work preparatory to the feast—in putting away from their dwellings every appearance of leaven, and in preparing sacrifices for burnt-offerings, &c.

5. We now offer the following reasons for believing that the feast of unleavened bread (15th Nisan) could not have fallen, in that year, on the seventh day, so as to merge in one the two Sabbaths.

1. The Saviour rose from the dead on the first day of the week; and, if he had been buried on the eve of the seventh day, the parallel between himself and Jonah, which he said was to be the only sign to that generation, would have been incomplete and delusive.

2. The Chief Priests and Pharisees, with their punctilious regard for the Sabbath, could not have gone to Pilate the day after the crucifixion, to demand a watch, (Mat. xxvii. 62) if it had been the seventh day.

3. And to this I call particular attention. It is quite evident from Mat. xxviii. 1, that more than one Sabbath had intervened between the depositing of the body in the sepulchre and the resurrection. From whatever cause, the translation of the word σαββατων (Sabbaths) in this and other passages connected with the resurrection, is incorrect. The word is in the genitive plural. It occurs twice in this verse, and, strange to say, receives two different renderings — the one giving us the singular "Sabbath," instead of the plural "Sabbaths"—the other giving "week" instead of "Sabbaths." The passage is "Ὁψε δε σαββατων τη επιφωσκουση εις μιαν σαββατων"—"But at the end of Sabbaths, as it dawned towards one of Sabbaths"—being very nearly a literal rendering. Now the last of the Sabbaths mentioned, we may say by the way, was a high festival, the first of the 50 days — on which the first-fruits were presented to the Lord—and the last of which was the day of Pentecost. But our present point is, that the first-mentioned σαββατων most conclusively intimates that more than one Sabbath had passed over since the crucifixion. The fact that Mark (xvi. 1) speaks of the Sabbath in the genitive singular, cannot invalidate Matthew's reference to a plurality of Sabbaths; for the statement that the seventh-day Sabbath had just ended, did not prove that a festival Sabbath had not preceded it.

4. In prosecuting my inquiries into this subject, I have been exceedingly struck with the occurrence of the Greek particle μεν in Luke xxiii. 56, as demonstrating the existence of another Sabbath besides the seventh day, between the day of preparation and the first day of the week. This particle, says Robinson, "implies the affirmation INDEED, TRULY, and at the same time points to something antithetic, or at least different." In the verse I have referred to, the contrast appears to be between a Sabbath on which they could buy (Mark xvi. 1) and prepare spices, though forbidden to do any servile work, and the Sabbath on which they rested entirely, doing no manner of work, according to the (4th) commandment. I will venture to offer the following translation of the passage for impartial criticism: — Ὑποστρέψασαι δε, And having returned — ἡτοίμασαν, they prepared—ἀρώματα, spices—καὶ μύρα, and ointments—καὶ τὸ μεν σαββατον, and on the indeed Sabbath — ἡσυχασαν, they rested from all labor*—κατα την εντολην, according to the commandment.

[Let me indicate, in a parenthesis, some of the uses of μεν in the New Testament. "I indeed baptize" (Mat. iii. 11)—"Some indeed preach" (Phil. i. 15)—"I am verily a man, a Jew" (Acts xxii. 3)—"Elias truly must first come" (Mat. xvii. 10) — "All things indeed are pure" (Rom. xiv. 20, &c.)

But apart from this rendering of the passage; if it was the seventh day Sabbath that "drew on," (Luke xxiii. 54) as they laid the Lord in the sepulchre, there would be time neither for buying nor preparing spices before it arrived, for we read that "even had come" when Joseph of Arimathea went to Pilate and begged the body of Jesus. It must, therefore, have been late in the evening before the body was finally deposited in the tomb, and the stone rolled to the door. And, when Joseph and Nicodemus departed, after performing their pious duties to the dead, (John xix. 38) they left "the women sitting over against the sepulchre." Now, taking into account that the day commenced at sunset, how could it be said that they rested on the Sabbath day, according to the commandment, if, after the evening was thus advanced, they returned from the sepulchre, and bought and prepared spices and ointments? It seems to me that it took some considerable time, spared from the engagements of the succeeding day — being the first of unleavened bread—to prepare the spices for the anointing of the body; so that, when the holy day of rest came, it is naturally stated, in contrast to these employments, that on the indeed Sabbath they rested according to the commandment.

5. Towards supplying us with the proper day of the week, W. Cunningham, Esq. the eminent scientific chronologer, furnishes us with the following information. He says, "From the year 28 to 34, the only Passover full moon which falls on Friday, is A.D. 33." Now it is all but universally admitted, that A.D. 30 was the year of the crucifixion; and, indeed, the data furnished by Matthew fixing the nativity before Herod's death, coupled with Luke's account of the commencement of Christ's ministry in the 15th year of Tiberias, make it abundantly clear that A.D. 30 was the year of the Saviour's death. Mr. Cunningham, however, will not accept this year as the correct one, for the very reason which would lead me to adopt it, viz. that the Passover full moon did not fall on Friday in that year. He was under the impression that the evidence from Scripture in favor of Friday was undeniable, and therefore, like a true-hearted man, he writes — in words strikingly corroborative of my position — "We may for these reasons reject also the dates of Sir I. Newton and Mr. Gresswell, since both in the years A.D. 30 and 34, the Passover commenced upon Wednesday, and ended upon Thursday." The following table — most satisfactorily, to my mind—points to 30 as the year in which Christ reached the age of 34, and in which he was, therefore, crucified at the 4th Passover from the commencement of his ministry A.D. 26. And it is a fact worthy of notice, that on the testimony of such men as Sir Isaac Newton, Mr. Gresswell, and Mr. Cunningham, there was no Passover full moon on Friday, within two years before and two years after A.D. 30.

LETTER TO PROTESTANTS.

It is to you who bear the name of Protestant that I wish to speak. You live in what is called a Christian country. As an Englishman, allow me to ask you what you protest against? Do you protest against Popery? If so, why do you retain so much of it in your churches? Now I shall put you to the test. Is the Popish church established by law, and joined or coupled to the state? The answer is, It is. Is yours? Was there ever a time when the churches established by the apostles were coupled to the state? The answer is, No. Were the Primitive Christians ever governed or ruled over by a Sovereign—King, Queen, or Pope? Do we find in the New Testament such dignified persons as Archbishops, Rectors, Deans, Vicars, Incumbents, or Curates? If not, where did you get them from? You know—speak out—why, from the Papists. But you know we think this right because our great men do. Do we ever read of Peter's diocese, or Paul's diocese, or Timothy's diocese? Or do we ever find the Church of Christ at Jerusalem or Corinth calling upon the public, or making a dean, or forcing the ungodly to pay church-rates or tithes? Now where does this state of things spring from? From the New Testament or from Rome? Was this state of things known to the Primitive Christians? I answer, No! What do you protest against, then? Do you protest against priestly assumption? If so, you have plenty of that to protest against in your own church. Do we ever read of any of the apostles being distinguished by the clerical garb these wear; or do we read of such distinctions as clergy and laity, ministers and people, or my parishioners? These are the very things that have caused so much corruption in the churches. Division and sects! Paul told those who were believers, to speak the same things. He said also, "I hear that there are divisions amongst you, and I believe it; for one says I am of Paul, another I am of Apollos, and another I am of Cephas." But the answer of Paul is, "Was Paul crucified for you; or, whose name were you baptized into?" In this day one says, I am of Luther; another, I am of Calvin, another; I am of Wesley. I ask, if there is not enough in that sweet endearing name of Jesus, to charm and captivate your minds? Does any human name add such charms as the name of him who shed his most precious blood for you? Do you love the Saviour above every other thing: for he has said, "He that loveth father or mother, sister or brother, more than me, is not worthy of me?" How, then, shall we show our love to the Saviour? Why, by attending to the divinely appointed ordinances. The first Christians made a point of meeting together every first day of the week, to attend to the apostles' doctrine and teaching, and the fellowship or contribution. Now this was done by the saints for the Lord's poor and the spread of the gospel; also, for the breaking of the loaf, and the drinking of the cup, and the prayers. This constituted their worship. Afterward, the gospel was preached to the people free of charge. The ungodly never were called upon to contribute to the Lord's work, for if the ungodly do contribute to this work, you make them co-partners, and thus join the kingdom of Satan to that of God's dear Son. Now, I tell you what you protest against. All the divinely authorized ordinances, and you have brought in their stead the following Romish traditions, for which you have no scriptural authority—1st, Your college-trained and licensed preachers, who are to wear a particular garb, and to occupy a pulpit in some consecrated and licensed building, called church or chapel, and to have stated stipends which may be sold or bought by auction; and others to have vicarages, incumbrances, and so on. These are supported by tithes, church rates, pew rents, and begging sermons. I ask you, Are these to be found in the New Testament? I say, No. Instead of weekly contributions for the Lord's poor, they spend the money which the crafty and unscriptural exact from the mixed multitude, in large fine buildings, with lofty towers and noisy bells in them, whilst the inside is composed of boxes, like theatre boxes, at various prices. Read the second chapter of James. Pews are like ministers, the highest bidder is the purchaser. And O! how they love those enchanting, those endearing names, such as Right Reverend Father in God—the Lord Bishop of the Diocese—Right Reverend—Very Reverend—Reverend—My Parishioners—My Parish—and this most honorable distinction, Clergy and Laity, Minister and People. In the church of Christ at Jerusalem and at Corinth, they had elders in every church, who had no stipends. They were not lords over God's heritage. But they did their work of a ready mind. There were deacons to serve at the Lord's table, and attend to the Lord's poor. Read 2 Corinthians xi. from the 24th verse to the end of the chapter. Take Paul for your example, and blush for your doings.

I hope that you will protest against these wrongs. I am persuaded that those poor Galilean fishermen and the worthy Master, did not desire that you should make such a handle of Christianity. J. S.

EXTRACT OF LETTER FROM BRO. P. S. FALL.

THE following extract is from a letter dated Nashville, Tennessee, June 22, 1860. The writer, Bro. P. S. Fall, with his wife and daughter, visited England about nine years ago.

"You will have learned that we have removed to this place, and that my specific work is found in an effort to reconstruct one of the earliest, as well as one of the largest and most useful of our congregations, which had been scattered by a spiritualistic Universalist and Unitarian. In this arduous work our labors have been greatly blessed; and we hope that by the end of the year, we shall see as many members in the congregation as it ever contained. A wonderful change has already occurred, and those most doubtful are now ready to admit that it may be restored to its active usefulness and happiness. For all this we are truly thankful, and regret neither the sacrifices nor the labor it has demanded.—We have organized a fine Sunday school, with an attendance of about 70 scholars. In this I teach a class of young ladies, using Mimpriss's edition of Greswell's Harmony of the Gospels, which we find highly instructive, and the young people are much interested in the study it exacts.—At half-past ten the congregation meets for a discourse addressed to the world and to the church. The study of some one of the apostolical epistles is consecutively pursued, with occasional interruptions by other topics, with a view to develop the religion and to assert its claims. After this we break the loaf, attend to the contribution for the poor, and conclude our worship with hymns of praise. In the afternoon we assemble in Bible-class for the more particular study of the Sacred Word. Here each one who desires information, or has any to impart, is privileged to speak or to inquire, for the general edification. At night another discourse is delivered, and immersions are performed. These are frequent, and are witnessed with great interest by the crowds that attend.

"The good cause is onward in all parts of these United States, where we have 'ministers of the word.' It is listened to with great interest, and is readily obeyed. More demands are made upon us for labor than can be met, and if we had hundreds more preachers all could find useful and constant employ. Occasionally I see a number of your Harbinger, and am rejoiced to learn that so great progress has been made in England. However you make haste more leisurely than we, because the protracted meeting system adopted by our evangelists here is unknown with you. Perhaps your work is better done."

REVIEWS, NOTES ON PASSING EVENTS, CORRESPONDENCE, &amp;c.

THE MESSIAHSHIP, or Great Demonstration ; written for the Union of Christians, on Christian Principles. By WALTER SCOTT. Cincinnati : H. S. Bosworth.

WRITTEN for the union of Christians, but not for that only. It is a book on evidence, and well calculated to make Christians—to render faith strong, and that, too, not by the use of many books, but by the Bible itself. The types and symbols of the Old Covenant are shewn to be fully capable of demonstrating that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God. This one proposition, in which the author has long delighted, and which by tongue and pen he has held out to view, he finds proved by the Bible, and this proved he sees all Christianity established. One, who does not see with him to this extent, says—

"2. I object farther :—Your sixth postulate I deem exceedingly faulty. You would have me concede that one main element being proved true, all is proved true. How is this made to appear ?

Answer.—I said that the main element in our religion being proved true, all is proved true—that element is the 'Messiahship.' If it be proved true that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, how can anything he spoke possibly be false ? And if the New Testament cannot be false, it is impossible but that the Old Testament, which leans on it for facts, should be true.

Question.—How do you hope to convince me that either of your generalizations—Christ or Christianity—is true ?

Answer.—By evidence.

Objector.—'By evidence !' I accept your reply ; but, Sir, I had thought that the preachers of the gospel had avowedly conceded the insufficiency of Christian evidence, and taught universally, as I myself have heard many of them do, that for faith in Christ we must rely ultimately on the invisible and subjective operations of the Holy Spirit of God. Is it not so ?

Answer.—It is to be regretted, Sir, that the preachers to whom you refer, disclose so inordinate an attachment to their own theories, and so little reverence for the great logical formula on which revealed religion rests for proof. These ministers being too intensely metaphysical, and more eager to subordinate the Scriptures to their own theories of conversion, than their theories of conversion to the Scriptures, have

" 'Knowledge is power ;
But evidence is knowledge :
Therefore, evidence is power.'

"Our theories oftentimes require to be recast ; the Scriptures never. These affirm that 'Faith comes by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God' (Rom. x.) When, therefore, we lean for evidence of the Messiahship of Jesus our Lord on the Holy Scriptures, we lean on the Holy Spirit who inspired them. We, therefore, reiterate the syllogism—

" 'Knowledge is power ;
But evidence is knowledge :
Therefore, evidence is power.'

"If the innumerable mystics of the day assert the contrary, and treat the great 'Demonstration of the Spirit,' (Cor. ii.) as weakness and not power, let them answer for it to that Spirit."

This book is the result of long study. Again and again the reader is arrested by a single page containing and making clear more than many writers supply in a volume. There are precious things in Bro. Scott's book, and many of them, and many valuable groupings of facts and truths, as—

"It should be observed that the Messiah was never regarded or spoken of as having come, till after his instalment in office at St. Jordan. Now Daniel limits this instalment to a certain number of weeks of days, which Sir Isaac Newton has shewn answers precisely to the time of our Lord's inauguration at Jordan, in the days of John the Baptist.

But the instalment of our Lord was the initiation of his mission, the Messianic mission. He was God's ambassador, God's missionary to the Jews. And many particulars of this mission has God's testimony to them.

1. The mission was to be preceded by a herald.—Isa. xl. Mal. iv.
2. To be initiated by the Most High.—Isa. liv., lxi.
3. Restricted to the Jews.—Deut. xviii. xix.
4. Organized with a particular design.—Isa. lxi.
5. To be delivered in God's own words.—Deut. xviii.
6. To be taught without noise or ostentation.

7. The missionary Messiah was to be a preacher.—Isa. lxi.

The missionary course to be pursued by the Messiah after his inauguration, is noticed in the following particulars :

1. He shall teach the people.—Ps. xlv.

3. Shall preach glad tidings to the poor.—Isa. lxi.

3. Labor chiefly in Zabulon and Naphtali.—Isa. ix.

4. Appear in the temple at Jerusalem.—Hag. Mal.

5. Negotiate a New Covenant.—Jer. xxxi.

6. Was to be a Jewish Prophet.—Deut. xviii.

7. Work miracles.—Isa. xxxv.

8. Be rejected by the rulers.—Isa. liii.

9. Betrayed by a friend.—Zach. xi.

10. Tried and condemned.—Isa. liii.

11. Numbered with the wicked in his death.—Isa. liv.

12. Buried in a rich man's tomb.—Is. liv.

13. Raised from the dead the third day.—Ps. xvi.

Did Christ anticipate his inauguration? I answer he did. This is made evident by his language to the Jews—'Have you not read in the Prophets, They shall all be taught of God?' If Christ expected the Jews to have learned from prophecy that the New Economy was to be introduced by a lesson from God, he himself, of course, could not possibly have been unaware of it. Again, that he anticipated his initiation into the office of the Messiah, is evident from his not appearing until John's mission had taken its full and natural effect upon the people, and roused them to the idea of the Messiah's immediate appearance—'When all the people were baptized, then cometh Jesus from Galilee to John at Jordan, to be baptized.'—Mat. iii. It is evident that nothing was fortuitous—nothing accidental to him."

But, like most human productions, this book has its faults, and though not so great as its excellencies, they are not inconsiderable. It is too American for some of us. With all our love for Bro. Jonathan, we cannot say Amen to the following:—

"The Most High is working out a system of mercy in the church, and of right in society. These are the points which, for thousands of years, the index of the providential government has been slowly approximating. In the United States both have been gained. Here the aim of the government is peace, and the aim of religion is salvation. The one is in the hands of Christ, and the other in the hands of Christians."

Had it stood—In the United States

considerable progress has been made, or, the States are far ahead of the Kingdoms of Europe—it might have passed. When, however, we are gravely told that "in the United States both have been gained," we rub our eyes, look around, ask how long we have been sleeping, and enquire what has taken place on the other side of the Atlantic that has not reached our ears. Surely the entire English press is not in conspiracy to misrepresent American society! Only a few days back we had notice of scenes acted in halls of legislation far more in the line of the Benicia Boy and Tom Sayers than savoring of Christianity—and, if what we have recently received as facts is not the wildest fiction, our trans-Atlantic cousins have little more ground for saying that their government is in the hands of Christians, than we have who are favored with a Queen-Defender of Faith and a bench of Lord Bishops. If it be true that the American government is in the hands of Christians, they are Christians of modern stamp, and little likely to be recognized by those who measure by the olden rule. We regret to say, that this kind of laudation runs through the book, and intimates that the kingdom of the stone, (Dan. ii.) and that the promised new heavens and earth are realized in the American government and people.

"The text vouches that this government was to be created 'without hands'—then it must be set up by the diffusion of principles. Our government arose in this way." On the same page is written—"This nation is Christ's nation, and as it is highly blessed, so, if we recognize not the fact, we will be awfully chastised." On another page, after allusion to Millennial glory, we read—"Amen. Let us look to America as the first of the Messianic nations." Again, "We concur with Mr. Henry, that our government is 'a new' thing in the earth: and add, that on this point it admirably meets the conditions of prophecy, 'Behold, I create a new heavens and a new earth'—a new government and a new people."

Then we have another fault to record. Bro. Scott is perhaps second to no one in clearness when writing upon the influence of the truth in conversion. He has thrown off all mysticism so far, but, unhappily, in all that relates to the Holy Spirit on the Christian's side of immersion, he is a mystic of the first water. On page 8 he writes:—

"But the transitional part of our religion, by which the other two parts are united—the transfer of converts by 'water and Spirit,' from the world to the church, has been by far the most difficult to attain. 'Except a man be born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of God.' Having looked on this celebrated saying of the Redeemer for nearly forty years without understanding it, and having eagerly seized and carefully examined every exposition that happened to come before him, the author ever felt that the verse ever remained unexplained. Impatient of his consummate ignorance of this deep saying of the blessed Saviour, he took the liberty, in humble prayer, to ask his great Redeemer, with holy reverence, 'Whether his great Redeemer had spoken that saying never to be understood? If not, the author prayed that he might be enlightened.' The interpretation found in the body of this book was shortly after suggested. The case may perhaps illustrate this saying of James — 'If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth liberally to all men, and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him' (James i.) The Lord, as of old, may have said, 'Gabriel, show this man the Scripture' (Dan, viii.)

So then the author's interpretation was suggested, or inasmuch as to him it was new, we may say, revealed. Surely now we may pray in the language of the Wesleyan hymn-book—

"Unlock the truth, Thyself the key, Unseal the Sacred Book."

Only one thing is wanted—the demonstration of the Spirit. Revelation and demonstration went together in the Apostles' days.

But what is this newly-revealed truth?

"By what means is this transition made? Christ answers the question to Nicodemus when he says, 'Except a man be born of water and the spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of God' (Jno. iii.) This is dogmatical, authoritative, infallible, and we accept it literally as such. The regenerated man must be translated from the kingdom of God by 'water and the spirit.' The convert must first be carried personally from the midst of God's enemies to the midst of his friends by water—baptism. This is a personal change of state, not a spiritual, for that which is born of the Spirit is spirit—the mind and not the body; as then the body is transferred from one state to another by water, so the soul is changed from one state to another by the Spirit.

What are these two states? They are the negative and the positive; as animal life is negative in the womb and positive in the world, so spiritual life is negative in regeneration and positive in new birth, or negative in the world and positive in the church. When the preached gospel has regenerated a man, and the traditional ordinance has conveyed him from the world to the church, he is then born of water, and stands to God in relation of a son; here the holy Spirit of God meets him as such, and by a spiritual operation, understood only by its effects, changes the state of his soul from the negative to the positive of spiritual life. Here Spirit meets spirit, the divine the human, and the convert is endowed with 'power, love, and a sound mind.' He now cries Abba — Father.

As after birth, the animal life of a child is, by the first breath of air it inspires, changed from the negative to the positive of animal life, so in religion, the first breath of the Spirit of God upon the regenerated heart dispels all fear, trembling, and dubiety, and sheds upon the new-born spirit filial love, power, energy, and perfection of conscience. Thus the regenerated is changed by water and the Spirit in the state, both of his soul and his body, and is thence called a new creature. The change, then, is both personal and vital."

Here, then, are taught, not one new birth, by water and the Spirit, but two—one by regeneration and water, and one by subsequent contact, altogether additional to regeneration by the Word, and wholly independent of the truth. The Saviour should have said—Unless a man is born again AND AGAIN, he cannot see the kingdom of God. That our author claims an operation of the Spirit wholly distinct from that which is by the truth, is clear. Also, that after regeneration, and birth through water into the kingdom, there is yet another new birth.

"No deduction from any promises could possibly be more legitimate than the following from the above, viz. that in our salvation there is something which the Word or preached Gospel can do, and something else which it cannot possibly do; it can convert and regenerate, but it cannot change the soul which it regenerates from the negative to the positive of spiritual life. To do this great work is the office and prerogative of the Holy Spirit of God only.

It follows that a preacher's work extends just so far, and there it stops, 'Go, convert the nations,' &c. By the glorious Gospel he can convert and baptize; but to change the state of the soul from the negative to the positive, is not his prerogative."

After the above we read—

"A criticism, known to me for thirty years, and recently revised with great elegance and power by one of the brethren, is against me here. I am constrained, nevertheless, by reasons which I have not space to insert, to regard the old reading as the true one, it being illustrative of the change of which the Redeemer was speaking, namely, the invisible change of the soul by the Spirit."

To this criticism we shall next month (D.V.) direct the reader. It is that so clearly presented by Bro. Lard in his Review of Jeter. At present we stand by it, and expect so to do, until Bro. Scott's revelation is attested by a "manifestation of the Spirit."

"PLEADINGS NUMBER TWO."

THIS is Tract No. 9, by S. J. Chew, and like the last number of "Looking for Daylight," devoted to the enlightenment of Baptists, and designed to show what Baptists were. The author says—

"Before me lie two books: and these are the 'Authentic Records' from which the evidence will come. They are published and patronized by Baptists—and are issued by the Hanserd Knollys' Society; a Society established for 'the Publication of the Works of Early English and other Baptist Authors.' The titles of the three are these: 'The Records of a Church of Christ, Meeting in Broadmead, Bristol, 1640—1687;' 'Records of the Church of Christ Gathered at Fenstanton, Warboys, and Hexham, 1644—1720;' and 'Confessions of Faith, and other Public Documents, Illustrative of the History of the Baptist Churches of England, in the 17th century.'" All are ably edited by Edward Bean Underhill, now one of the Secretaries of the Baptist Foreign Missionary Society. I am going, then, to use no spurious or questioned Records—only such as are undoubtedly authentic."

This introduction is followed by suitable extracts and plain remarks, such as Baptists may do well to attend to. The following may be taken as a fair sample:—

"A few note-worthy things remain to be told of this Broadmead Church. This is the simple covenant by which at the first they bound themselves:—"That they would, in the strength of Christ, keep close to the Scriptures, the Word of God; and to the plain truths and ordinances of the Gospel, of church fellowship, breaking bread, and prayers; and to be subject to one another, according to the discipline and admonition commanded by the rules of Christ in the New Testament, or the Scriptures."—p. 32. For the support of the preacher they made no solicitations of the world: they had no such things as pew-rents. An opportunity was given at meetings of the church for mutual teaching. 'It is the duty,' said they, 'of every gifted brother to minister or exercise his gift in the church whereof he is a member.' In addition to their preacher, there were elders, deacons, and deaconesses. On the 24th of June, 1662, the church assembled—

'For setting apart the persons chosen by fasting and prayer. Upon which day brother Thomas Ellis was set apart for the work of a ruling elder of a congregation, as added to brother Robert Purnell in the same work; and aged brother Spurgeon was set apart to the office of a deacon, as added to brother Simpson; and sister West, a widow woman, was set apart to the office or work of a widow or deaconess in the church.'—p. 72.

In their documents they never style themselves a Baptist Church. They preferred more scriptural designations of themselves.*

Again, Mr. Chew says—

I now take up the next book named—'The Records of the Churches of Christ gathered at Fenstanton, Warboys, and Hexham.' The General Baptists claim this Fenstanton church. But if a man named Edward Thomson find a people call him Timothy Tomkins, will he not find fault? 'What right have you,' he may fairly say, 'to call me by a name which is not my name, and which I never take?' Did this church at Fenstanton own the name of General Baptist, or of Particular Baptist, or of Baptist? Did it ever call it-

* As everybody ought to know, the meaning of "Baptist" is, one who administers baptism; one who baptizes. There may, therefore, be but one Baptist in what is called a Baptist Church; that is, there may be but one who baptizes. That royal document by which Mr. Hardcastle was licensed to preach, runs thus:—"Charles, by the grace of God, &c. In pursuance of our declaration of the 13th of March, 1671-2, we do hereby permit and license Thomas Hardcastle, in the parish of Eton, in Gloucestershire, of the persuasion commonly called baptised, to be a teacher," &c.—p. 217. There may be some propriety in the expression, "persuasion commonly called baptised;" while there is no such propriety in the expression, "I'm a Baptist," if the person using it has never baptised any one.

self by one or other of these titles? Never, so far as this volume shows. Here are scores of letters from and to the churches at Fenstanton, Warboys, and Hexham; but not a solitary case of their adopting any such sectarian name. The nearest approach I can find is this: 'We, the church of Christ of baptized believers, of Stanton and Warboys.'"

Then again on p. 7—

"They gave no quarter to the venerable tradition of infant sprinkling: 'But,' said they to one, 'as if these were but light things, you have further provoked the Most High, in dishonoring His name, by giving consent to the sprinkling of your child; doing that in the name of God, which he doth exceedingly abhor.'—p. 248. They found not that believers were to be kept some months waiting, ere they could be baptized. Mark this notice of a preaching service:—'The Lord so appeared on our side, that six persons, the same evening, desired the ordinance of baptism, and the next morning were baptized.'—p. 293. They regarded it as no light thing for members to forsake the assembling of themselves together:—

'This question was propounded, viz. whether it was not the duty of every member (unless prevented by sickness or some other extraordinary occasion) to be present at the assembly of the congregation upon the first day of the week?

'This question was taken into consideration, and found agreeable to the holy Scripture. Whereupon this ensuing order was made by the general consent of the congregation, viz. that if any members of the congregation shall absent themselves from the assembly of the same congregation, upon the first day of the week, without manifesting a sufficient cause, they shall be looked upon as offenders, and [be] proceeded against accordingly.'—pp. 125, 126.

Mutual teaching they held to be according to the Scriptures; and thus resolved, 'That it shall be lawful for any person to improve their gifts in the presence of the congregation.'—p. 98.

Besides an evangelist, elders and deacons were recognized. Grantham, a Baptist author of some celebrity, and then living, has thus testified—

'In the baptized churches some are elected messengers, bishops, or deacons, without the free choice of the brotherhood where such elections are made. And after such election of persons of known integrity, and competent ability, we proceed to ordination, with fasting and prayer, and the laying on of hands, according to the Scripture.—Acts xiii. 3, xiv. 23, vi. 5, 6. All which apostolic practices are religiously observed in the baptized churches, without any devised adjuncts or ceremonies of our own or others.'—p. 72, 73 note.

As to how often they met together at the Lord's Supper, the record is not clear. The Broadmead church certainly was not apostolic in this respect. The Baptist 'Orthodox Creed,' of 1678, while declaring that 'no unbaptized, unbelieving, or open profane, or wicked heretical persons, ought to be admitted to this ordinance, to profane it,' adds, 'And this holy ordinance ought to be often celebrated among the faithful.' But the Baptist 'Amsterdam Confession,' of 1611, is more express and to the point:—'Every church ought, according to the example of Christ's disciples, and primitive churches, upon every first day of the week, being the Lord's day, to assemble together, to pray, prophesy, praise God, and break bread.'—Confessions of Faith—p. 152, 153, and 8.

Their views concerning the design of baptism I will not enlarge upon. Their Confession, in 1660, in laying down the qualifications of ministers of the Gospel, disowns 'all such who come not first to repent of their sins, believe on the Lord Jesus, and so baptized in his name, for the remission of sins.'

Crosby, in his 'History of the Baptists,' thus repeats their faith:—'The Apostles were sent forth with full power and authority to invite them—Jews and Gentiles—both to come into the Christian church, which they were then founding; the entrance whereinto was by baptism; assuring them that they should therein receive a complete and perfect remission of all their sins.'—Vol. iv. p. 413. And in a 'Serious Reply to the Rev. John Wesley, by Gilbert Boyce, a Baptist,' this comment is given on Peter's words, 'Repent, and be baptized, every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins:—'If any man will be so venturesome as to cast out baptism from the above text, and declare remission of sins to repentance only, I may, by the same authority he can produce, cast out repentance, and declare remission of sins to baptism only.'"

The brethren may do well in supplying their Baptist neighbours with a copy.

LETTER FROM A. CAMPBELL TO J. INWARDS.

In the British Millennial Harbinger, December, 1859, appeared a letter from Bro. Jabez Inwards to Bro. A. Campbell. Mr. Campbell's reply, as under, appeared in his February Millennial

Bethany, Va. Jan. 7, 1860.

BROTHER INWARDS.—My dear Sir:—Your very kind, fraternal, and interesting letter of November the 5th, 1859, addressed to me in the pages of the British Millennial Harbinger, of last month, now lies before me. With much interest and pleasure I have read it. For some months past, almost every week, I have been purposing to address by letter, several of my old and much beloved brethren, in both England and Scotland, amongst whom, especially, are brethren John Davies, of Mollington, D. King, of London, Elder James Wallis, of Nottingham, Brother Paton, of Glasgow, &c. But I find in my multitudinous and multifarious duties and obligations so much to engage my attention, to occupy my time, and to command my energies, that while “to will is always present with me,” how, and when to execute, I do not find.

It affords us, in this new world, no little pleasure to be informed that the great and good cause in which we are alike superlatively interested is, with firm and steady pace, advancing in England and Scotland, though not in the same ratios with its progress in this land of transcendent freedom of thought, of speech, and of action. It is, however, according to Paul, always “accepted,” in our Sovereign’s jurisdiction, “according to what a man has, and not according to what he has not;” provided only, that there be a willing mind.

Original, not merely ancient, but original Christianity, is the superlatively grand and most heart and soul-absorbing theme in the broad area of earth, and time, and human interests. Empires and ages, and all the wealth and honours of earth shrivel and shrink into comparable insignificance when placed in antithesis with the riches, the glory, and the honor, and the immortality of each and every heir of “the purchased possession”—the true, the real, the everlasting paradise of God—

“Where the tree of life for ever grows,
And its living water ever flows.”

The Christianities of patriarchdom, and of papal-dom, under patriarchs and popes, Greek and Roman, were, and are, so far as they exist, mere mummeries of hypocritical disguise, to fascinate and delude weak and vulgar minds.

But we, in this pre-eminently favored land, in this most inquisitive and searching age, in groping and searching our way back to the apostolic age, have found “seven Herculean pillars,” on which are inscribed—“one God and Father of all,” “one Lord,” “one faith,” “one baptism,” “one body,” “one Spirit,” and “one hope.” Christ’s church, or kurion oikos, abbreviated into one word, kurioik—whence kyrke, thence church, is, by apostolic authority, founded upon these seven monumental pillars. Heaven asks no more than a believing recognition and a cordial reception of these seven monumental pillars. Faith in these seven grand realities, confessed, presents a platform long enough, broad enough, and strong enough to sustain the whole kingdom of our divine and glorified Redeemer. We can with full assurance of understanding, full assurance of faith, and the full assurance of hope, submit this divine synopsis to all Protestant Christendom as a divinely suggested, a divinely submitted, a divinely instituted and divinely sanctioned platform—commensurate with all the conditions, circumstances, and reasonable demands of the present nominal church militant. Of this, we profess assurance of understanding, an assurance of faith, and a full assurance of hope. We can see in it all the characteristics of the divine wisdom and grace. We also see in it a response to all the necessary and rational cravings of fallen humanity, and also its perfect practicability on the part of the most scrupulous and conscientious disciples of the Lord Jesus Christ, who earnestly desire the fellowship, the communion, and the co-operation of all and every one who loves the kingdom and the coming of our common Lord and Saviour Jesus the Christ. To him be all glory, and honor, and blessing, for his life, his death, his sacrifice, and his prayer, his last prayer (John 17th.) for the union, communion, and co-operation of all his disciples and followers, during the trials and conflicts of this present dispensation of his kingdom in this fallen and alienated world. To him be all glory, honor, and dominion, all blessing and praise, now, henceforth, and for ever and ever. Amen.

P.S. On re-reading your very inter-resting and fraternal communication, and what I have now written, I feel disposed to add a few words on your very significant and important utterance, that it is "By obedience and faith" we can recognize him as our Saviour who has conquered death and the grave, and who is "the resurrection and the life."

There is, indeed, "the obedience of faith," as well as faith itself. Both are essential to our full developed stature as perfect men in Christ Jesus. Faith grows up into full assurance; but it is by exercise, and by exercise only. We grow physically by a proper exercise of our whole physical powers; and we grow spiritually by the full exercise of our spiritual powers.

There are but three essentials of human life; so far as food is concerned. These are breath, bread, and water. Give to the infant man—the weaned child, a supply of pure air, pure bread, and pure water, and he may grow up into a perfect man. Each and every one of these is indispensable to the physical life, growth, and health of man. It is even so in the new-born Christian. He must have the word or breath of life, he must have the bread of life, and he must have the water of life. These are all indicated in Christian life and health. The Christian must have the Word and Spirit of God. He must have the positive ordinance of Christian baptism, and "the Lord's supper," and "the Lord's-day." These are as indispensable to his Christian life and health as good air, good water, and good bread are to his physical or animal health, life, and comfort.

The Lord himself chose this imagery—"I am the bread of life." "If any man eats of this bread he shall live for ever" (John vi. 51.) Again, he says—"If any one drink of the water that I shall give him, he shall never thirst." "There shall be in him a well of water springing up into eternal life." "This he spake of the Spirit which they who believe on him should receive" (John vii. 38-39.) Are not these beautiful and striking analogies instituted by the Great Teacher himself? Are we not amply justified from these premises and teachings, in instituting comparisons and analogies? And most especially, are we not authorized to use those which the Lord himself, the Great Teacher, has introduced, and incorporated with his manner and matter of teaching?

In conclusion, we must enter our protest against the introduction of a new Christian terminology, or nomenclature. Fairly translated into our present living vernacular—our genuine Anglo-Saxon—all is done that can be done for those who speak it.

Any man that presumes to say that the Lord Jesus Christ, who so loved the world as to die for it, to become a propitiatory sacrifice to justify the God of the universe in pardoning sin; and in receiving into his bosom every sinner, every fallen and ruined man that would accept his person and his sacrifice; and yet did not, would not, or could not, present his gospel and his aid in such a form as that no man without a special extrinsic and superadded aid could understand it, could believe it, could receive it, could obey it to his own salvation, has become the prey of an insidious, "empty, and deceitful philosophy"—a "philosophy falsely so-called." Such reasoners, thinkers, speakers, or preachers have made the Word of God of none effect, either to themselves or to their species. If they do not understand Moses and the Prophets, Jesus and his Apostles—neither would they, nor could they, in that state of mind, understand or believe any man or spirit sent to them from the regions of the dead. So, substantially, spake the Great Teacher himself. And who can, or who dare, to question his veracity or his competency to state the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, on a theme the most superlatively interesting and important to mankind.

Most sincerely and affectionately your brother in the hope of immortality,

A. CAMPBELL.

DIALOGUE BETWEEN A MEMBER OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND AND A DISCIPLE OF CHRIST.

Member.—What do you think of the tract of the Rev. J. C. Ryle, "Plain-Speaking, No. 14," entitled "The Bible Way to Heaven?"

Disciple.—The facts respecting Jesus are brought out, but he does not show the sinner the way of salvation. On receiving these facts, he does not tell him what he must do to be saved !

M.—Are you using proper language? Can man do anything?

D.—Peter, on the day of Pentecost, preached the Gospel, and his hearers exclaimed, "What must we do?" (Acts ii. 37.) Jesus appearing to Saul of Tarsus, when struck to the ground, exclaimed, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" (Acts xix. 6.) In these instances they were not reproved, but directions were given.

M.—What, then, is the first thing to be done?

D.—Believe the Gospel.

M.—What is the Gospel?

D.—Paul says, "Brethren, I declare unto you the Gospel I preached, by which also ye are saved. How that Christ died for our sins, according to the Scriptures; and that he was buried, and that he rose again the third day" (1st Cor. xv. 1.) On the day of Pentecost Peter preached with great effect this Gospel. Read Acts ii. 22-37, iii. 13-15, 26; also, Acts x. 34-43, to the end of chapter. "The Gospel is the power of God, and unto salvation to every one that believeth;" that human beings are capable of employing but two kinds of power. For the sake of distinction we call these physical and moral; the former is adapted to matter, the latter to mind. They are quite distinct. You would not attempt to act on the will or affections of a human being as you would on a lathe or steam engine. You must bear this distinction in view, and advance a step further. What the Scriptures testify will appear as we proceed. God, who is omnipotent, operates on all things in harmony with their nature; He operates in material nature as well as upon the hearts and consciences of men. In creation, the Spirit of God put forth what I call, for want of a better term, physical power. In conversion he acts on the mind, the affections, by moral power, by the truth.

M.—I perceive the distinction. But can I believe the Gospel?

D.—Yes; you hear me speak of an event I witnessed, and knowing me to be a truthful man, you believe what I say. Apply this to any well-authenticated fact—to something said to have been done, and well-attested, in the Word of God. What should prevent you believing it? "Faith comes by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God" (Rom. x. 17.)

M.—What is the Scriptural definition of faith.

D.—"Faith is the confidence (substance is not a good rendering) of things hoped for; the conviction of things not seen."

M.—Supposing I believe, what is the next step?

D.—Peter says, "Repent, and be converted," or turn to God (Acts ii. 38, iii. 19.)

M.—How can I know when I repent?

D.—Do you feel the weight of sin? Do you experience your own helplessness?—Are you sorrowing on account of your alienation from God? Paul says, "Godly sorrow worketh repentance not to be repented of" (2 Cor. vii. 10.)

M.—Experiencing this, and having for some time past great anxiety on account of my unsaved state, what am I now to do?

D.—"God is no respecter of persons"—"He wills all men to be saved"—"All that will come, may come"—"He waits to be gracious," and Paul comforts us by saying, "That God was in Christ, reconciling the world to himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them: and hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation. Now, then, we (the Apostles) are ambassadors for Christ; as though God did beseech by us, we pray in Christ's stead, be reconciled to God" (2 Cor. v. 18 to end)—"With the heart man believeth unto righteousness; and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation" (Romans x. 10.)

M.—What next?

D.—You must be born, "not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God" (John i. xiii.) Jesus to Nicodemus, "Unless ye are born of water and spirit, ye cannot enter into the kingdom of God" (John iii. 5.)

M.—When was the kingdom opened?

D.—On the day of Pentecost.

M.—Is the kingdom and the church the same?

D.—In entering one you enter the other, and become a member of "the one body," of which Jesus is the Head. Jesus says, "He that believeth, and is baptized, shall be saved" (Mark xvi. 16); and Peter says. "Be baptized, every one of you, in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins" (Acts ii. 38.) Paul says, "Christ loved the church, and gave himself for it, that he might sanctify and cleanse it with a bath of water by the word" (Eph. v. 25-26.) Read also attentively Rom. vi. and Col. ii.

M.—This is important. Is a person thus born of water and Spirit?

D.—Thus are believers baptized into the one body: "Now ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular" (1 Cor. xii. 27.)

M.—By this do you not make too much of baptism?

D.—Not more than did Jesus and his ambassadors, for you cannot find, from Acts to Revelation, a member who was not thus introduced. Baptized believers are called saints, and faithful brethren in Christ (Col. i. 13)—they have been translated from the kingdom of darkness into the kingdom of God's dear Son—their sins are blotted out (Acts iii. 19)—they have heard words by which they are saved (Acts xi. 14)—they are made free from sin (Rom. vi. 18)—they are the children of God—they have put on Christ—they are in Christ—they are Abraham's seed, and heirs of the promise (Gal. iii. 26 and following verses)—they are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people (2 Pet. ii. 9.)

M.—I am truly obliged for the pains you have taken. I shall ponder on the glad-tidings you have disclosed to me.

THE SCRIPTURES IN ITALIAN AND GERMAN.

Those who have waited anxiously for the revised version of the Holy Bible, will perhaps feel that the American Bible Union has done well in not giving all its resources to the English work. How important, that Italy should have the word of the Lord! The tenth Annual Report of the American Bible Union gives the following:—

"In the May quarterly we publish a number of highly interesting extracts, from letters received from Italy, in reference to the circulation of the same version, Italian Testament, printed by the American Bible Union. The space which they occupy, forbid their repetition in this Report, but we subjoin a few sentences to show their character.

NAPLES.

'There has never been so much religious excitement as now, at any previous time. The best educated classes feel the necessity of examining, not only themselves, but also their creeds, and the doctrines which they have hitherto believed. A translation which shall guarantee the Bible faithfully translated from the Hebrew and the Greek, into our tongue, as it is spoken and written in our day, will be all that we have desired. And this, thanks be to God, we now have, in the New Version of the American Bible Union, made by you, and revised by the most learned men of Italy. It is, therefore, received as the authentic translation of the Catholic Christian Church (not the Papist) in Italy. The edition which is now being made in Piedmont, the New Testament first, and then the whole Bible, we hope will be extensively circulated even here. I do not believe it will meet opposition, if made without noise.'

TUSCANY.

'Our friends in Piedmont inform us, that several thousands of copies of the Italian New Testament, reprinted by them, will soon be in circulation in Tuscany. With respect to the new translation which you have given to the public, it is acknowledged to be the most faithful and literal that can be made. Even the Church of Rome could not but confess that you have made it without party spirit, and, I will add, under no theological influence.'

ROME.

'Let us now speak of the Bible—I mean your translation of it. The New Testament is in the hands of many, who have made it their companion both in and out of the house. We have received that last collection of money which you sent us, and with it have printed several thousand copies more than we were expecting to be able to make. The book is printed in Italy! Italy, this unhappy country which we inhabit! In Italy—thanks be to God, the Word of God is now printed in our own language. Yes! and it is read, it is meditated upon, and contemplated. What effect it produces you know in part. For myself this is the great revolution which I am desiring, and by which I believe our countrymen will be delivered from their oppression.'

TURIN.

'The publication of the New Testament proceeds very satisfactorily. The number of copies already issued exceeds 15,000. As you know, we propose to publish 50,000 of your translation, which is most preferred and popular on account of the style in which it is written. It is regarded by the learned as the most literal of all, which is as much as to say, the most faithful. The Committee have resolved not to reprint Diodati, partly because as many copies as are wanted may be obtained from English Bible Societies. The style of it is not that of our day; and, in many places the Old Testament is not according to the Hebrew meaning. Martini we do not recommend at all; and it is painful that any Protestant Society should encourage its circulation. Persons who do not know enough of our language, would do well to leave it to us to judge of our Italian translations.'

GERMAN SCRIPTURES.

The friends of the Bible Union are already acquainted with the fact, that for several years it has been doing something to circulate the Scriptures in Germany, through the instrumentality especially of Brother Oncken. The voice of Brother Oncken has been heard all over our land, calling upon the people of God to stretch forth their hand in aiding to give the Word of God abundantly to the millions of the German nations. An especial call was made by the devoted missionary some months since upon us to furnish him with the means of distributing some 100,000 Testaments among the German regiments that were then put into the field. The Bible Union sent this appeal to its friends, and some 4000 dolls. were contributed, chiefly in one dollar contributions, for this purpose, and employed as designed.

We cannot but thank God for this call made upon us from Germany. We feel as if we should regard it as a blessed opening for the Word of God; an opportunity that we should thank God for, and rejoice to hasten to meet. If we are to pray that the Word of God should run and be glorified, are we not to look upon such a call as an abundant answer to our prayers, and gratefully improve it? We regard Germany as one of the most hopeful fields for the distribution of the Word of God. We would, therefore, recommend that the distribution of the Holy Scriptures among the German people, in Germany and elsewhere, be made hereafter an essential part of the work of the Bible Union.

ITALIAN SCRIPTURES.

Our efforts to give the pure Word of God to Italy have thus far been most signally crowned with the divine blessing. We feel encouraged to recommend to the Union such continued effort in that great centre of corrupt Christianity and spiritual darkness, as our means will permit. Communications, recently received from Naples, Tuscany, Rome, and Turin, show a most hopeful waking up of the Italian mind on the all-important subjects of circulating and searching the Scriptures. The New Version of the American Bible Union is received by the educated classes as their standard version, 'and is acknowledged to be the most faithful and literal that can be made.' 'Even the Church of Rome confesses that you have made it without party spirit.' With fervent gratitude to God in view of the fact that Italy now has a faithful and perspicuous version of the New Testament Scriptures, and that the people are beginning to feel the necessity of diligently examining its precious pages for the Way, the Truth, and the Life, and that our version is preferred by the people to any other, your committee would recommend that, to the extent of our ability, the seat of the Anti-Christ be encircled by shining sentinels of heaven, the pure words of the Living God, which are able to save the soul through the faith that is in Christ Jesus; therefore,

Resolved,—That the board be encouraged to employ a colporteur in Italy for one year, more or less, provided that they shall be satisfied, after personal communication with him, that the fruit of his labors justify them in so doing."

QUERY AND ANSWER

JERSEY, July 1, 1860.

Dear Brother King,—I am very glad that you have of late been contending earnestly for scriptural communion. I am fully convinced that this is neither more nor less than the communion of the "one body," into which "all [who compose it] are immersed."—1 Cor. x. 16, 17, and xii. 13, compared with Ephes. iv. 5. But I desire the benefit of a "consultation," as to what is necessary to scriptural communion beyond the "one baptism." I refer especially to the case of those who have been baptized, but who, as babes, not having yet learned the "whole counsel of God," are in fellowship with Pedobaptists. I have considered several passages which seem to apply to such persons, but am not yet quite sure that the application is entirely suitable. The passages I allude to are Rom. xvi. 17, 2 Thes. iii. 6-14, Titus iii. 10, 2 John ix. 10. I think it is generally admitted, that before we apply any passage of Scripture, there must be an essential parallelism in the cause referred to. Now I think we must allow that there is a difference between converts in the Apostles' time, who could not fail to understand the nature of baptism, and many in modern times, whose education, &c. prevent their seeing it at once. In the one case the transgression must have been wilful—in the other we have reason to believe it may be otherwise.

As I desire in all things to act in accordance with truth—however repugnant it may be to my feelings—I should be happy to hear what you and others, my seniors in Christ—or my superiors in the knowledge of God, may say. Hitherto I have acted so as to give to all baptized believers—of correct life—whose only transgression is the one I have mentioned, the benefit of the above consideration—but if I am in error I wish to be corrected as soon as possible.—I am, dear brother, yours in the bonds of the gospel, J. H. W.

ANSWER.

The Lord's table is in the kingdom. Those who have not entered that kingdom are not eligible to approach. To this J. H. W. agrees. But there are some who have entered the kingdom, who become disorderly by bringing to the table those who have not entered. Is this a fair statement of the case? I think it is. If so, what are we to do with those who become disorderly? The law is clear. Withdraw from those who walk disorderly. That there is, not only a difference, but a very wide difference, between those who now leave undone the Lord's commands from not understanding and those who wilfully reject them, must be admitted, but the difference is one which the Lord himself will deal with—he will adjust it in the future. He, in the meantime, gives us his laws, and requires that we obey them, and withdraw from those who do not. D. K.

ITEMS OF NEWS.

BIRMINGHAM, LEICESTER, SWANSEA.

In Birmingham, several have been immersed since the notice last month.

Lord's day, June 24, and the three following, I spent in Leicester, during which time five meetings were held, and four persons immersed. Lord's day, July 1, Bro. Chew held good meetings in Leicester, and good open air meetings—one was immersed. He also held meetings on the Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday following.

Lord's day, July 8, I met the little church in Swansea, South Wales. Last August Bro. Hopkins came to Birmingham to urge that Bro. Evans might be supported as an evangelist, and located in Swansea, where there were then about ten brethren. The result of Bro. Evans' labors in this important town is, that though great care has been taken as to the persons received, the church now numbers about forty, with every prospect of increase. They have a small neat room, in which I have spoken several times; as also in the open air, having generally good and attentive congregations. During the week I delivered nine discourses, including one for the Temperance Society. On the Friday night I was reminded of the Philippian gaoler, not that I got either into prison or the stocks. With us anything approaching to a midnight baptism is not usual, but here, on the Friday night, when the multitude had retired to sleep, we met some forty persons upon the sands, and walking out into the sea, I immersed three whose good confession we had before received.

On the following Lord's day I preached for a Baptist church four miles from Swansea. I found there about seventy members, seemingly much advanced, and willing to know and do the Lord's will. For ten years they have stood together, only having had a minister for about eighteen months, with whom they did worse than when depending upon themselves. There are useful speakers among them, some fit for the oversight, or bidding fair soon to become so. They are all baptized, and seeking to be directed by the law of the Lord. There is every reason to expect, that ere long they will fully shew forth the order of the Lord's house. Bro. Evans has since spoken for them, and I have delivered a second discourse in their nice little chapel.

During the second week of my stay in Swansea, we have had several useful meetings—though some of our arrangements for open air meetings fell through in consequence of rains. On the Friday evening we had a larger assembly in the Industrial School than any of our former gatherings, when I lectured upon "The Christian Ministry." The printed syllabus was the following—"The Church in Middletown: how it obtained its ministers—What was expected of them—What they suffered—What the church suffered—The one-man system opposed to apostolic example and precept—The opposite extreme—The church with a swollen tongue—A word to ministers, which their hearers may do well to listen to."

There are in and around Swansea, evidently openings for setting forth the truth

so as to produce good results, and there can be no doubt that the labors of our Bro. Evans have proved, and will prove, a blessing to many. The week before my arrival he immersed three, and two of those immersed by myself had been prepared by his instruction.

To-morrow, July 22, I expect to speak in Swansea three times, and the following morning start for North Wales, hoping to arrive in Birmingham in the course of the week. D. KING.

CARLISLE.

Since our last communication we have had our hearts cheered, by five giving themselves to the Saviour in his own appointed way. We have likewise received two other additions; one a brother from the church in Drumclair, and another restored to fellowship with us in the glorious gospel of our Saviour Jesus Christ. We are in expectation of others soon. W. WOOD.

CLERKENWELL.

Since my last report I have to inform you that two males and one female have been immersed by Bro. Langridge and myself, into the names of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Having found more commodious premises, the church formerly meeting in Warner-street has removed thereto, viz. the Hall of Progress, situate in Northampton-buildings, Rosoman-street, Clerkenwell. The evangelist, Brother Langridge, is laboring in faith and hope, sowing the seed, visiting from house to house, and daily meeting with many curious incidents in connection with the State Church agents, who hope to proselyte by presents of tea, sugar, and such like—"Meats for the belly, and the belly for meats, but God will destroy both it and them." These sons of the clergy loudly protest against the people who neglect to have their children razed, and manifest fully this awful truth, they do not know God. Our work is plainly before us. May the Lord bless and prosper the work of our hands, and lift up the heads and strengthen the hearts of all His children, to contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints.

JOHN DAIRSON.

Brookly-street, Islington.

DUNDEE.

On Lord's-day, July 8th, accompanied by Bro. George Mitchell, we started per railway to Auchtermuchty, via Lady Bank, where we intended to spend the day with the brethren. The morning was beautiful, and the landscape imposing, by the brilliant rays of the monarch of day, reflecting on Nature's rich dress at this season of the year. On our way we had some interesting conversation with a few travelers who were going to the same locality, on the great departure from primitive Christianity. This they readily admitted, and that something ought to be done, but it is no easy matter to get the people to obey and practice the ancient order of things. We hope the few hints given them may have due effect on their minds.

On our arrival at the "gude toon," we were kindly received by the brethren, and spent a most pleasant day with them. Bro. Mitchell delivered an important address on "What is Christianity?" in the course of which, he contrasted the so-called Christianity of the present day with that taught and preached by the Apostles of our Lord. The audiences were good, and I hope the effort made by our brother will be productive of beneficial results. In the evening a few of the brethren met at Bethany Cottage, the residence of Sister Dron, where we took tea, and had some happy conversation on many topics relating to the kingdom of God. We felt the want of our late much-esteemed Brother Dron, both in the church and in the social circle. There was a gravity and dignity about him which few possess; at the same time he was so amiable and kind in his manners, and so ready to communicate to others the vast amount of knowledge he had attained by the study of the Scriptures. His position in the church and the world commanded the respect of all. Ah, death! what gloom thou hast cast over the human family! What desolation thou hast wrought!

On parting with the brethren we accompanied Bro. Forsyth to Falkland, and spent the night there. It was once the seat of royalty, and part of the ancient palace is still standing, the remains of former grandeur. The scenery around Falkland is very grand. On Monday morning we viewed the palace garden, and saw some of the finest specimens of horticulture to be seen in Scotia. The brilliant blossom of flowers in the greenhouse was most imposing indeed. Of the beauties of Falkland Den and its wild ravines, the Temple, and Bruce Monument, I cannot enter into detail. The commanding view from the Monument, and also from Falkland Hill (the remains of a volcanic eruption, some 1300 feet above the level of the sea) is very fine, and every admirer of Nature cannot but appreciate it. As we stand gazing upon the scene, the bosom swells with emotion, and we sing with the poet—

"If on this earth are scenes so fair,
Where sin and death abound;
How beautiful beyond compare
Will paradise be found!"

Leaving Falkland we called on Bro. Thomas Brown, at Hospital Mill, near Springfield, and spent the afternoon at his pleasant residence, distant from Cupar about three miles. Bro. Brown is calculated to do much good in the church at Cupar, and since his removal from Dysart to that locality, he has been arousing public attention to the great concerns of the future. He is an excellent proclaimer of the truth, and commands the attention of the people. At 8 30 p.m. we left for home, arriving at ten p.m. much refreshed by our pleasant excursion in the kingdom of Fife. July 19, 1860. J. G. AINSLIE.

LANGLEY.

The Items of News hitherto noticed under the heading of Marlpool, must now be transferred to Langley. The brethren residing at Marlpool and the adjacent villages have, by God's blessing, and the kind assistance of their brethren, been enabled to build a chapel at the above-named village. Lord's day, July 15, was set apart for the opening service. Placards were posted in the neighbourhood, and a goodly company was gathered together at 7 a.m. to seek the Divine aid, and to return thanks for many mercies and great success. At 10.30 the brethren assembled to attend to the order of Christ's house, and were rejoiced to see a goodly number from Nottingham present to share their joys. Two penitents were immersed and added to the church. At 2.30 the Sunday school children were examined in Scripture knowledge, and gave great satisfaction by their answers to all present. Ten handsome and useful books were given as prizes, the names of the children being inserted, and the date of the opening of the chapel. At 6 p.m. Bro. Mumby, from Nottingham, preached the gospel to a crowded congregation. He selected for his subject, "Go ye into all the world," &c. (Mark xvi. 16) illustrating it by the following divisions:—1, the speaker, Jesus; 2, the spoken to, the Apostles; 3, the commission, "Go ye into all the world and preach;" 4, the subject, the Gospel; 5, the grace, or favor of God to every creature; 6, the conditions, faith and baptism; 7, the reward, salvation or condemnation. At the close he had the pleasure of hearing a confession, and of baptizing a young woman, into the name of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit; thus adding by faith, repentance, and baptism, three to the church of Jesus on the day of opening the meeting-house.

On Monday, July 16, the brethren from Marlpool, Nottingham, Newthorpe, Ripley, Morley-Hays, Bulwell, and Loughborough, with their friends, took tea together, in number about 160. At 7 p.m. a public meeting was held, when addresses were delivered by Bros. Powers, Blair, Dawson, and J. Wallis. This was an excellent meeting, there being a very large and attentive audience, whilst the speeches were appropriate and effective.

On Lord's day, July 22, Bro. J. Wallis, of Nottingham, delivered three addresses. The congregations were numerous, and two made the good confession.

There can be no doubt that the impression made on these occasions will outlive the present generation. The meetings were good—well conducted and well attended, the place, indeed, being too small to accommodate comfortably both brethren and strangers. Our prayer is, May the Lord of the harvest crown the labors with abundant success. R. MUMBY.

LOUGHBOROUGH.

After a long silence, we have the pleasure of announcing, that a daughter of Brother and Sister Brookes made a public confession of her faith in Jesus as the Son of God, and the same hour of the night was buried with Christ, by baptism into the likeness of his death. She has been added to the church of the saved, and we trust she will walk worthy of her confession and calling. R. MUMBY.

NEWTOWN (ASHFORD, KENT.)

I enclose 5s. in stamps for the "Evangelist Fund," and one shilling for three copies of "The Principles and Objects of the Reformation," by R. Richardson. Three of us are meeting here every "Lord's-day" for the breaking of the loaf, in commemoration of the death of our risen and exalted Redeemer; and are also endeavouring, by the distribution of tracts and conversations, to make known the principles of the Reformation. Although we do not find many desirous of following Christ, we are, nevertheless, not without hope that the seed sown may spring up and bring forth fruit to the honour and glory of His name. I pray that God may abundantly bless you at the coming General Meeting.

THETFORD.

I have the pleasure to inform you, that on Lord's day morning, May 13, I had the privilege of baptizing two believing penitents into the ever glorious names, and each Lord's day since we have met to follow apostolic practice, in the fellowship, breaking of bread, and prayers. A meeting for the study of the Scriptures had been held at the house of one of the two brethren, and we hope that this is not all the fruit that may be gathered from this effort (by God's blessing.) The other brother is from Staffordshire, and has been a local preacher among the Primitive Methodists for eight years, but who, on hearing and examining into the truth, determined to leave that body at once. On last Lord's-day evening week, we went out and preached the word, and hope to make similar efforts during the Summer, trusting they may be blest. We are about trying to obtain a room in which to meet when the weather is unfavorable. If any brother should be coming our way, we shall feel glad of help, in this our day of small and feeble things. However, we have the promise left on record for our encouragement, "Where two or three are met in my name, there am I in the midst of them." I send you a copy of a bill which we have issued, stating the objects we have in view, viz. the restoration of Primitive Christianity.—F. W. F.

BAUGHALL.

Enclosed is a small contribution from the brethren here for the Evangelist Fund.

I hope you continue in the enjoyment of good health, and that in the spiritual concerns of the soul there is also corresponding prosperity. All friends here are pretty well. There is still with us a little devoted band, anxious for the honor of Christ, determined to maintain his ordinances and to contend for his faith. We should never lose sight of the Saviour. They who look away from him become weary and faint in their minds. There is much preaching now, but O, that Christ were always the theme! Everywhere we want men preaching Christ, and unqualified submission to him for salvation.

I was glad to hear, a few days since, from Bro. Walker, of Australia, (formerly of the church in Chester.) At South Brighton, near to which he resides, they had, a few years ago, only four members; now they have thirty-five members and a new chapel. P. STEPHEN.

Mollington, July 23, 1860.

WIGAN.

With thankfulness we acknowledge the power of God in the conversion of four persons, who have been immersed since our last report. J. COLLIN.

WREXHAM.

We have lately been passing through a severe trial, having had to exclude several of our members; but our Heavenly Father has not left us without some token of his love, for we had the pleasure of adding four young people to our number on Lord's-day, July 8, they having duly put on Christ in baptism during the previous week. May they and we continue steadfast.

July 20, 1860.

UNITED STATES.

There are 5000 Disciples in the State of Arkansas.—It is affirmed that in the year 1859 no less than 40,000 additions were gained to the Disciples in the U.S.

OBITUARIES.

MRS. ESTHER DAVISON

gently fell asleep in Jesus on Lord's day, April 1, 1860. The previous Lord's day she met with the little flock, as usual, and expressed her joy in what she heard, and her hope in Jesus. On the Thursday following she had an attack of pleuro-pneumonia, and having for two years suffered from a pulmonary complaint, she was unable to bear up against the acute state of things which set in upon her. The evening before her departure she repeated several times a portion of that beautiful hymn,

"Jesus, lover of my soul,
Let me to thy bosom fly."

On the morrow she sat up in bed, and looking at her son, said, "You see, John, I shall rally; you will be mistaken in my case," and talked with him freely on church matters for some time: but death had claimed her for his own, and at 10 p.m. she departed with a sigh so soft as almost to preclude the idea that she was gone. We do not sorrow as those without hope. J. DAVISON.

Brookly-street, Islington.

ROBERT LAIRD.

On the 19th ult. our aged and respected brother, Robert Laird, calmly fell asleep in Jesus, after a protracted and painful illness, which he bore with Christian patience and resignation. He was sensible until near the end, and could say in the prospect of death, "Though heart and flesh fail me. God is the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever." Consequently, we sorrow not as those who have no hope. He has been removed from suffering, to enjoy the blessedness of the dead who die in the Lord from henceforth; "Yea, saith the Spirit, they rest from their labours, and their works do follow them."

Our departed brother had presided over the church here, and laboured in word and doctrine, since its formation in 1834, and has ever been highly esteemed in love for his work's sake, which was a labour of love. Freely he had received from the Lord, and freely he gave; feeding the flock over which he had the oversight willingly, not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind, hoping to receive as his reward a crown of glory, when the Chief Shepherd doth appear. May all who have "put on Christ" be faithful unto death, and secure the crown of life, which he hath promised to all such. Grangemouth, July, 1860. W. WALKER.

FAMILY CIRCLE.

SONS OF EMINENT MEN.—Sons of eminent men seldom mount, as they are generally content to inflate their souls with their fathers' greatness, which is very easily done. They are satellites, which glow with a borrowed or reflected light, and when the source becomes extinct, and the light fades quite away, they are left in utter darkness. A transferred fame is not a substance, but a shadow. Distinction must be wrought out; it never comes at bidding. True greatness never goes upon crutches—it is as independent as the nature of man will admit. Being well born gives great facilities for education and distinction, but it can never take their place; they must be sedulously and wisely used, or poor advantages, well husbanded, will surpass them. Wealthy young men are apt to rely upon means, rather than upon study. Poor young men, though they complain of their hardships, frequently discover that these were the incentives to whatever of eminence they have reached.

THE CHARMS OF LIFE.—There are a thousand ills in this world to afflict and sadden; but oh! how many things that are beautiful and good! The world teems with beauty—with objects that gladden the eye and warm the heart. We might be happy if we would. There are ills we cannot escape—the approach of disease and death, of misfortune, the sundering of earthly ties, and the canker-worm of grief; but a vast majority of evils that beset us might be avoided. The course of intemperance, interwoven as it is with all the ligaments of society, is that which never strikes but to destroy. There is not one bright page upon the record of its progress; nothing to shield it from the heartiest execration of the human race. It should not exist—it must die. Do away with all this; let wars come to an end; and let friendship, love, charity, purity, and kindness mark the intercourse between man and man. We are too selfish, as if the world was made for man alone. How much happier should we be were we to labor more earnestly to promote each other's good. God has blessed us with a home which is not all darkness. There is sunshine everywhere—in the sky, upon the earth—there would be in most hearts, if we would look around us. The storm dies away, and a bright sun shines out. Summer drops her tinted curtain upon the earth, which is still very beautiful, even when Autumn breathes her changing breath upon it. God reigns on earth and in heaven.

INFLUENCE.—Every human being exercises an influence. The smallest pebble, thrown into the Atlantic, disturbs, to some extent, the mighty volume of the ocean. The ripples grow smaller and smaller as their circumferences increase, but they never cease until their microscopic influence is exhausted upon the surrounding continents. Every particle of air we breathe is distributed over the whole earth. Not a tear falls from the eye of grief that does not contribute, in an infinitesimal degree, to bless the humblest plant upon the most distant island of the sea. No power can waste all its sweetness in the desert air, for its rarified exhalations will travel over the globe, and form a part of the grateful fragrance in the air breathed by every human being. The child cannot fall from its mother's knees without causing the earth to remove from its orbit! A single good deed may seem trifling in itself, but it may continue to produce its effects during a thousand generations.

"All are but parts of one stupendous whole, Whose body nature is, and good the soul."

FLOWERS.—How the universal heart of man blesses flowers! They are wreathed around the cradle, the marriage-altar, and the tomb. The Persian in the far East delights in their perfume, and writes his love in nose-gays; while the Indian child of the far West claps his hands with glee as he gathers the abundant blossom,—the illuminated scripture of the priaries.—The Cupid of the ancient Hindoos tipped his arrows with flowers, and orange buds are the bridal crown with us,—a nation of yesterday. Flowers garlanded the Grecian altar, and they hang in votive wreaths before the Christian shrine. All these are appropriate uses. Flowers should deck the brow of a youthful bride, for they are in themselves a lovely type of marriage. They should twine around the tomb, for their unceasingly renewed beauty is a symbol of the resurrection. They should festoon the altar, for their fragrance and beauty ascend in perpetual worship before the throne of the Most High.

THE INFLUENCE OF POETRY.—I know something myself of hard work ; I know what it is to have had to toil when the brain was throbbing, the mind incapable of originating a thought, and the body worn and sore with exhaustion ; and I know what it is in such an hour, instead of having recourse to those gross stimulants to which all worn men, both of the higher and lower classes, are tempted, to take down my Sophocles or my Plato (for Plato was a poet), my Goethe, or my Dante, Shakespeare, Shelley, Wordsworth, or Tennyson ; and I know what it is to feel the jar of weariness gradually cease, and the darkness, in which all life had robed itself to the imagination, become light, discord pass into harmony, and physical exhaustion rise by degrees into a consciousness of power. I cannot, and I will not, believe that this is a luxury, or rather a blessed privilege, reserved for me, or my caste, or cause alone. If I know from personal experience—and I do know—that feelings such as these—call them romantic, if you will—can keep a man all his youth through, before a higher faith has been called into being, from every species of vicious and low indulgence, in all its forms—if I believe there are thousands

Of young imagination have kept pure,”

I am compelled also to believe, that as that which is human belongs to all humanity, so there is power in this pursuit to enable the man of labor to rise sometimes out of his dull, dry, hard toil, and dreary routine of daily life, into forgetfulness of his state, to breathe a higher, and a serener, and purer atmosphere. I will believe that for him, too, there is an “ Appeal to that imaginative power,

Which can commute a sentence of sore pain
For one of softer sadness.”

—F. W. Robertson.

LEARNING AND WISDOM.—There is a broad distinction between learning and wisdom. A man may be both learned and wise ; or he may be only learned, but not wise ; he may indeed be well versed in classical literature and in mathematical science, and yet have very little common sense and practical wisdom. The present system in our schools is intended to make men learned ; there ought to be a system which will make them wise.

THE LESSON OF LIFE—I think it is the want of charity, of love to all men, which keeps us so far apart, and makes the experience of each one more or less an unreality to every one else. How much might we learn even from the poorest and most wretched ! See how this common bond of humanity unites us all one to another ; how the links of this chain, from the lowest to the highest, are unbroken ; and how we are reminded of this every day and hour, if we will but look into the faces and eyes of our fellow-men, and read the words which are written there ! There are none so high as not to need our sympathy and love, and none so low that we cannot reach them by means of it. Let these thoughts be duly weighed, and we shall doubtless feel that we can do something towards cultivating kinder feelings.

A GEM FROM WEBSTER.—If we work on marble, it will perish ; if we work on brass, time will efface it ; if we rear temples, they will crumble into dust. But if we work upon immortal minds, if we imbue them with high principles, with a just fear of God and their fellow-men, we engrave on those tablets something which no time can efface, but which will brighten to all eternity.

THE ANIMAL KINGDOM.—Then have actually been ascertained, in the animal kingdom, about 61,000 species of living creatures. There are 600 species of mammalia—those that suckle their young—the most of which are quadrupeds. Of birds there are 4000 species, of fishes 3000, of reptiles 700, and of insects 44,000 species. Besides these there are 8000 species of shell-fish, and not less than 80,000 or 100,000 species of animalcules, invisible to the naked eye.

REVISED VERSION OF THE EPISTLE TO PHILEMON.

BY DR. HACKETT.

GENUINENESS OF THE EPISTLE.

NOTHING is wanting to confirm the genuineness of this epistle. The external testimony is unimpeachable. It is not quoted so often by the earlier Christian fathers as some of the other letters. Its brevity, and the fact that its contents are not didactic or polemic, account for that omission. We need not urge the expressions in Ignatius, cited often as evidence of that apostolic father's knowledge and use of the epistle—though it is difficult to regard the similarity between them and the language in verse 20 as altogether accidental. See Kirchofer's Sammlung, page 205. The Canon of Muratori, which comes to us from the second century, (Credner, Geschichte des Canons, p. 69 sq.) enumerates this epistle as one of Paul's epistles. Tertullian mentions it, and says that Marcion admitted it into his collection. Sinope in Pontus, the birth-place of Marcion, was not far from Colossæ, where Philemon lived, and the letter would find its way to the neighboring churches at an early period. Origen and Eusebius include it among the universally acknowledged writings (ὁμολογούμενα) of the early Christian times. The epistle is so well attested historically, that as De Witte says, (Einleitung, page 278) its genuineness on that ground is beyond doubt.

Nor does the epistle itself offer anything to conflict with this decision. It is impossible to conceive of a writing more strongly marked within the same limits by those unstudied assonances of thought, sentiment, and expression, which indicate an author's hand, than this short epistle as compared with Paul's other productions. Paley has a paragraph in his Horæ Paulinæ, which illustrates this feature of the letter in a very just and forcible manner. It will be found also that all the historical allusions which the apostle makes to events in his own life, or to other persons with whom he was connected, harmonize perfectly with the statements or incidental intimations contained in the Acts of the Apostles or the other epistles of Paul. It belongs to the commentary to point out the instances of such agreement.

Baur, a leader in the destructive school of criticism, would divest the epistle of its historical character, and make it the personified illustration from some later writer, of the idea that Christianity unites and equalizes in a higher sense those whom outward circumstances have separated. See his Paulus, p. 475 sq. He does not impugn the external evidence. But not to leave his theory wholly unsupported, he suggests some linguistic objections to Paul's authorship of the letter, which must be pronounced unfounded and frivolous. He finds, for example, certain words in the epistle, which are alleged to be not Pauline; but to justify that assertion, he must deny the genuineness of such other letters of Paul as happen to contain these words. He admits that the apostle could have said σπλάχνα twice, but thinks it suspicious that he should use it three times. A few terms he adduces, which are not used elsewhere in the epistles; but to argue from these that they disprove the apostolic origin of the epistle, is to assume the absurd principle that a writer, after having produced two or three compositions, must for the future confine himself to an unvarying circle of words, whatever may be the subject which he discusses, or whatever the interval of time between his different writings.

The arbitrary and purely subjective character of such criticisms can have no weight against the varied testimony admitted as decisive by Christian scholars for so many ages, upon which the canonical authority of the Epistle to Philemon is founded. They are worth repeating only as illustrating Baur's own remark, that modern criticism, in assailing this particular book, runs a greater risk of exposing itself to the imputation of an excessive distrust, a morbid sensibility to doubt and denial, than in questioning the claims of any other epistle ascribed to Paul.

TIME AND PLACE OF WRITING.

The letter to Philemon was one of the several letters (Ephesians, Colossians, Philippians) which Paul wrote during his first captivity at Rome. The arguments which shew that he wrote the epistle to the Colossians in that city and at that period, involve the same conclusion in regard to this epistle, for it is evident from Colossians iv. 7, 9, as compared with the contents of this epistle, that Paul wrote the two epistles at the same time, and forwarded them to their destination by the hands of Tychicus and Onesimus, who accompanied each other to Colossæ. A few modern critics, as Schulz, Schott, Böttger, Meyer, maintain that this letter and the others assigned usually to the first Roman captivity, were written during the two years that Paul was imprisoned at Cæsarea (Acts xxiii. 35, xxiv. 27.) But this opinion, though supported by some plausible arguments, can be demonstrated with reasonable certainty to be incorrect. The question belongs properly to a general introduction to the Roman group of letters, and may be passed over here without further remark.

The time when Paul wrote may be fixed with much precision. The apostle at the close of the letter expresses a hope of his speedy liberation. He speaks in like manner of his approaching deliverance in his epistle to the Philippians, (ii. 23, 24) which was written during the same imprisonment. Presuming, therefore, that he had good reasons for such an expectation, and that he was not disappointed in the result, we may conclude that this letter was written by him about the year A.D. 63, or early in A.D. 64; for it was in the latter year, according to the best chronologists, that he was freed from his first Roman imprisonment.

Tychicus was the bearer also of the epistle to the Ephesians, (Eph. vi. 21, 22) and hence that epistle and the two to the Colossians and Philemon were all written, no doubt, on the eve of the apostle's acquittal. Men never traversed the Appian Way, or crossed the Adriatic, bearing with them treasures of such value to the human race, as the two messengers who conveyed these writings of Paul to Ephesus and Colossæ. It is very possible that the letter to the Laodiceans, (Col. iv. 16) which has not come down to us, was entrusted to the same hands. We do not know what circumstances may have controlled the course of the journey. The most direct way was to cross the northern part of the Greek peninsula. They would embark at Brundisium, and disembark at Dyrrhachium, on the other side. They would then traverse the Egnatian way, along which Paul had passed and scattered the seed of the word. They would meet with Christian hospitality at Thessalonica. Apollonia and Amphipolis were on the route. The disciples at Philippi would be eager to hear tidings of the beloved apostle. From the Pass over Symbolum they would look forth once more upon the waters which divided Europe from their native Asia. Neapolis, the port of Philippi, lay at the base of that range of hills, and would afford them the means to cross to Troas or to the mouth of the Cayster or the Mæander, whence they could proceed to Ephesus, Laodicea, and Colossæ, in such order as their convenience, or the nature of their errand might require.'

PERSONS OF THE EPISTLE.

As to the persons to whom, and for whom the letter was written, all that we know we must gather from the epistle itself, and from the few intimations in the epistle to the Colossians. Philemon, whose name the letter bears, lived in all probability at Colossæ, a city of Phrygia, on the Lycus, a branch of the Mæander. The present Chonas, in the same neighborhood, (Arundel, Seven Churches, p. 158) perpetuates the ancient name.

Though it does not follow certainly that Philemon dwelt in Colossæ, because Onesimus was a Colossian, yet the obvious presumption from that fact is, that they belonged to the same place. Wieseler's idea (Chronologie, p. 452), that he was a Laodicean, not only disregards this presumption, but rests on false inference from Col. iv. 17, that Archippus (see v. 1) was a Laodicean, because the Apostle names him in that place (which was accidental merely) afterwards speaking of the church in Laodicea. Paul addresses the ἐνταῦθα in that passage to the Colossians, and hence Archippus must have been one of their number, and consequently Philemon one of them also, since the two are joined in the same salutation at the beginning of the epistle (verses 1, 2.) Theodore states the ancient opinion in saying, that the recipient of the letter was a citizen of Colossæ, and that his house was pointed out there as late as the fifth century.

Philemon was a man of property and influence, since he is represented as the head of a numerous household, and as exercising an expensive liberality towards his friends and the poor in general. All the circumstances under which he appears in the letter, indicate the possession of ample means and a superior social rank. He was indebted to the Apostle Paul as the medium of his personal participation in the gospel. All interpreters agree in assigning that significance to στανός μοι προσφεύεις in verse 19. It is not certain under what circumstances they became known to each other. If Paul visited Colossæ when he passed through Phrygia on his second missionary journey, (Acts xvi. 6) it was undoubtedly there, and at that time, that Philemon heard the gospel and attached himself to the Christian party. On the contrary, if Paul never visited that city in person, as many critics infer from Col. ii. 1, then the supposition which agrees best with the history is, that he was converted during Paul's protracted stay at Ephesus (Acts xix. 10) about A.D. 54-57. That city was the religious and commercial capital of Western Asia Minor. The apostle labored there with such success that it is said "all they who dwelt in Asia heard the word of the Lord Jesus Christ." Phrygia was a neighbouring province, and among the strangers who repaired to Ephesus, and had an opportunity to hear the preaching of Paul, may have been the Colossian Philemon. It is evident that on becoming a disciple, he gave no common proof of the sincerity and power of his faith. His character, as shadowed forth in this epistle, is one of the noblest which the Sacred Record makes known to us. He was full of faith and good works, was docile, confiding, grateful, was forgiving, sympathizing, charitable, and a man who, on a question of simple justice, needed only a hint of his duty to prompt him to go even beyond it. Any one who studies this epistle will perceive that it ascribes to him these varied qualities; it bestows on him a measure of commendation, which forms a striking contrast with the ordinary reserve of the sacr d writers. It was by the example and activity of such believers that the primitive Christianity evinced its divine origin, and spread with such rapidity among the nations.*

Onesimus was a native, or certainly an inhabitant of Colossæ, since Paul, in writing to the church there, speaks of him (Col. iv. 9) as ὃς ἐστὶν ἐξ ὑμῶν, one of you. This expression confirms the presumption which his Greek name affords, that he was a Gentile, not a Jew, as some have argued from μάλιστα ἐμοὶ in v. 16. Slaves were numerous in Phrygia, and the name itself of Phrygia was almost synonymous with that of slave. Hence it happened that in writing to the Colossians (iii. 22, iv. 1) Paul had occasion to instruct them concerning the duties of masters and servants to each other. Onesimus was one of this unfortunate class of persons, as is evident both from the manifest implication in οὐκ ἔτι ὡς δοῦλον in v. 16, and from the general tenor of the epistle. There appears to have been no difference of opinion on this point among the ancient commentators, and there is none of any critical weight among the modern. The man escaped from his master and fled to Rome, where, in the midst of its vast population, he could hope to be concealed, and to baffle the efforts which were so often made in such cases for retaking the fugitive. See Walter, Die Geschichte des Röm. Rechts, II. p. 63. It must have been to Rome that he directed his way, and not to Cesarea, as some contend; for the latter view stands connected with an indefensible opinion respecting the place whence the letter was written. Whether Onesimus had any other motive for the flight than the natural love of liberty, we have not the means of deciding. It has been very generally supposed that he had committed some offence, as theft or embezzlement, and feared the punishment of his guilt. But as the ground of that opinion we must know the meaning of ἡδίκησε in v. 18, which is uncertain, not to say inconsistent with any such imputation. Commentators, at all events, go entirely beyond the evidence when they assert that he belonged to the dregs of society, that he robbed his master, and confessed his sin to Paul. Though it may be doubted whether Onesimus heard the gospel for the first time at Rome, it is beyond question that he was led to embrace the gospel there through the apostle's instrumentality. The language in v. 10 is explicit on this point. As there were believers in Phrygia when the apostle passed through that region on his third missionary tour, (Acts xviii. 23) it is not improbable that Onesimus was brought in contact with some of them at Colossæ or elsewhere, and consequently may have known something of the Christian doctrine before he went to Rome. How long a time elapsed between his escape and conversion, we cannot decide; for πρὸς ἄπαν in verse 15, to which appeal has been made, is purely a relative expression, and will not justify any inference as to the interval in question.

After his conversion, the most happy and friendly relations sprung up between the teacher and the disciple. The situation of the apostle, as a captive and an indefatigable laborer for the promotion of the gospel (Acts xxviii. 30, 31) must have made him keenly alive to the sympathies of Christian friendship, and dependent upon others for various services of a personal nature, important to his efficiency as a minister of the Word. Onesimus appears to have supplied this two-fold want in an eminent degree. We see from the letter that he won entirely the apostle's heart, and made himself so useful to him in various private ways, or evinced such a capacity to be so (for he may have gone back to Colossæ quite soon after his conversion) that Paul wished to have him remain constantly with him.* His attachment to him as a disciple, as a personal friend, and as a helper to him in his bonds, was such that he yielded him up only in obedience to that spirit of self-denial, and that sensitive regard for the feelings or the rights of others, of which his conduct on this occasion displayed so noble an example.

There is but little to add to this account, when we pass beyond the limits of the New Testament. The traditional notices which have come down to us, are too few and too late to amount to much as historical testimony. Some of the later fathers assert that Onesimus was set free, and was subsequently ordained Bishop of Bereæ in Macedonia. (Const. Apost. vii. 46.) The person of the same name mentioned as Bishop of Ephesus, in the first epistle of Ignatius to the Ephesians, was a different person. It is related also that Onesimus finally made his way to Rome again, and ended his days there as a martyr during the persecution under Nero.

OCCASION AND OBJECT OF THE LETTER.

Under this head, too, all our knowledge must be derived from declarations or inferences furnished by the epistle. As the parties in the transaction were all Christians, and Paul sustained such intimate relations to the two who were estranged from each other, he was naturally desirous of effecting a reconciliation between them. He wished also (waiving the δύηκον, the matter of duty or right) to give Philemon an opportunity of manifesting his Christian love in the treatment of Onesimus, and his regard, at the same time, for the personal convenience and wishes, not to say official authority, of his spiritual teacher and guide. Paul used his influence with Onesimus (ἀνέμεψα, in v. 11) to induce him to return to Colossæ, and place himself again at the disposal of his master. Whether Onesimus assented merely to the proposal of the apostle, or had a desire at the same time to revisit his former home, the epistle does not enable us to determine. On his departure, Paul put into his hand this letter as evidence that Onesimus was a true and approved disciple of Christ, and entitled as such to be received, not as a servant, but above a servant, as a brother in the faith, as the representative and equal in that respect to the apostle himself, and worthy of the same consideration and love. It is remarkable to observe how entirely Paul identifies himself with Onesimus, and pleads his cause as if it were his own. He intercedes for him as his own child, promises reparation if he had done any wrong, demands for him not only a remission of all penalties, but the reception of sympathy, affection, Christian brotherhood; and while he solicits these favors for another, consents to receive them with the same gratitude and sense of obligation as if they were bestowed on himself. Such was the purpose, and such was the argument of the epistle.

It may be assumed from the known character of Philemon, that the apostle's intercession for Onesimus was not unavailing. There can be no doubt that agreeably to the express instructions of the letter, the past was forgiven; the master and the servant were reconciled to each other; and if the liberty which Onesimus had asserted in a spirit of independence was not conceded as a boon or right, it was enjoyed at all events under a form of servitude, which henceforth was such in name only. So much must be regarded as certain; or it follows that the apostle was mistaken in his opinion of Philemon's character, and his efforts for the welfare of Onesimus were frustrated. Chrysostom declares, in his impassioned style, that Philemon must have been less than a man, must have been alike destitute of sensibility and reason not to be moved by the arguments and spirit of such a letter to fulfil every wish and intimation of the apostle. Surely no fitting response to his pleadings for Onesimus could involve less than a cessation of everything oppressive and harsh in his civil condition, as far as it depended on Philemon to mitigate or neutralize the evils of a legalized system of bondage, as well as a cessation of everything violative of his rights as a Christian. How much further than this an impartial explanation of the epistle obliges us or authorizes us to go, has not yet been settled by any very general consent of interpreters. Many of the best critics construe certain expressions (τὸ ἀγαθόν in v. 14, and ὑπὲρ ὃ λέγει in v. 21) as conveying a distinct expectation on the part of Paul, that Philemon would liberate Onesimus. Nearly all agree that he could hardly have failed to confer on him that favour, even if it was not requested in so many words, after such an appeal to his sentiments of humanity and justice. The traditions to which I have alluded indicate an ancient opinion that such was the result of the apostle's meditation.

ITS ÆSTHETIC CHARACTER.

The epistle has been universally admired as a model of delicacy and skill in the department of composition to which it belongs. The writer had peculiar difficulties to overcome. He was the common friend of the parties at variance. He must conciliate a man who supposed that he had good reason to be offended. He must commend the offender, and yet neither deny nor aggravate the imputed fault. He must assert the new ideas of Christian equality in the face of a system which hardly recognized the humanity of the enslaved. He could have placed the question on the ground of his own personal rights, and yet must waive them in order to secure an act of spontaneous kindness. His success must be a triumph of love, and nothing be demanded for the sake of the justice which could have claimed everything. He limits his request to a forgiveness of the alleged wrong, and a restoration to favor and the enjoyment of future sympathy and affection, and yet would so guard his words as to leave scope for all the generosity which benevolence might prompt towards one whose condition admitted of so much alleviation. These are contrarieties not easy to harmonize; but Paul, it is confessed, has shown a degree of self-denial and a tact in dealing with them, which in being equal to the occasion could hardly be greater.

"The epistle," says Luther, in the Preface to his Commentary upon it, "presents a charming and masterly example of Christian love. St. Paul takes the poor Onesimus to his heart, stands as representative for him with his master, intercedes for him as if it was himself who had sinned and not Onesimus, divests himself of his own rights, and so compels Philemon to relinquish also his. Erasmus says of the letter, "Cicero never wrote with greater elegance." Bengel's gnomic description is, "mire doreios." "It is a precious relic," says Meyer, "of a great character. It pursues its object with so much Christian love and wisdom, with so much psychological tact, and without a renunciation of the apostolic authority, is so ingenious and suggestive, that this letter, viewed merely as a specimen of the Attic elegance and amiability, may rank among the epistolary masterpieces of antiquity." "It is impossible to read it," says Doddridge, "without being touched with the delicacy of sentiment, the masterly address that appear in every part of it. We see here, in a most striking light, how perfectly consistent true politeness is, not only with the warmth and sincerity of the friend, but even with the dignity of the Christian and the apostle. If this letter were to be considered in no other view than as a mere human composition, it must be allowed to be a masterpiece of its kind." Buckminster, in his admirable discourse on this epistle, describes it in the same terms.

There is an extant letter of the younger Pliny, which he wrote to a friend whose servant had deserted him, in which he intercedes for the fugitive, who was anxious to return to his master, but dreaded the effects of his anger. Thus the occasion of the correspondence was similar to that between the apostle and Philemon. It has occurred to scholars to compare this celebrated letter with that of Paul in behalf of Onesimus; and as the result they hesitate not to say, that not only in the spirit of Christian love, of which Pliny was ignorant, but in dignity of thought, argument, pathos, beauty of style, eloquence, the communication of the apostle is vastly superior to that of the polished Roman writer.

Some of those traits of the epistle which have led to such an estimate of its merits, admit of being illustrated in the notes; but it must be left mainly to a careful perusal of the epistle itself, combined with a distinct view of the circumstances under which it was written, to show how fully it deserves the commendation which it has received.

REVISED VERSION.

PAUL, a prisoner of Christ Jesus, (a) and Timothy the (b) brother, to Phile-

(a) In inverting the names, the Common Version is not consistent with itself: compare v. 6; 1 Cor. 1.4; Gal. iv. 14. The variation is without motive, and must be an oversight. This order of the names is most common in Paul's epistles, though it is not so frequent there as Ἰησοῦς Χριστός.

(b) Our translators (I use the customary designation, though, as the late Archdeacon Hare remarks, revisers would be more correct, since they merely wrought over the previous English Versions) render the article by "our," i. e. the apostle and his readers. But the limitation is not expressed, and may as well be omitted. The mon the beloved (c) and our fellow-laborer, and to Apphia the beloved, 2 and Archippus our fellow-soldier, and to the church (d) in thy house: Grace be (e) to you, and peace, from 3 God our Father and the (f) Lord Jesus Christ.

I thank my God always, (g) making 4 mention of thee in my prayers, hearing of thy love and faith, which thou hast toward the Lord Jesus, and unto all the saints; that the fellowship (h) 6 article may signify "the brother" extensively known as such, not in this particular circle alone; compare 2 John v. 1. See also Koch's explanation in the notes on the Greek.

Verse 2, the sister; v. 6, or communion; ib. or assembly.

(c) As the same epithet occurs without the pronoun in the next verse, it is more correct to omit it here.

(d) The older English Version (Tyndale, Cranmer) have "congregation." That is the better term etymologically, but has passed into a different use. There are objections to "church," but as many or greater objections, as far as I can see lie against any other word.

(e) The Greek formula involves "be," and the Common Version usually supplies it elsewhere; compare 1 Cor. i. 3, 2 Cor. i. 2, Gal. i. 3, Eph. i. 3, &c. The italics I strike out always, because if they are necessary to the sense they belong to the text as much as the other words, and if they are not necessary they are interpolations. They were used first in the Geneva Version.

(f) "Our," before "Lord," occurs only in the Rheims Version.

(g) Tyndale places "always" here in his first edition.

(h) The Common Version leans here upon the Versions from the Vulgate; for Wiclif has "comynynge," and the Rheims "communication." The other Versions have "fellowshippe, fellowship" [Tyndale, Cranmer, Geneva]; and our translators render the same Greek word by that term in numerous other instances, of Acts ii. 42, 1 Cor. i. 9, 2 Cor. vi. 14, Phil i. 5, ii. 1, 1 John i. 3, 6, 7, &c. "Communication," as used at present, suggests a positively erroneous idea. "Fellowship" has at least this advantage, that it leaves the passage open to the questions which arise out of the Greek. "Communication" or "participation" are the next preferable terms.

of thy faith may become effectual in the knowledge of every good thing which is in us unto Christ Jesus. For we have much joy and consolation in thy love, because the hearts of the saints have been refreshed by thee, brother. Wherefore, though having much boldness in Christ to enjoin upon thee that which is becoming, yet for love's sake I beseech rather; being such a one as Paul an old man, and now also a prisoner of Jesus Christ, I beseech thee for my child whom I have begotten in my bonds, Onesimus; who in time past was unprofitable to thee, but is now profitable to thee and to me; whom I have sent back to thee. But do thou receive him, that is, my own flesh (o)

Verse 7, or, I had.

(i) The participial structure, as in the Greek, is better than the verbal [Common Version.] The question is not whether he might have the boldness or not [for he claims to have it] but whether he should give proof of it on this occasion.

(j) "That which becometh" [Tyndale, Geneva]; "that which was thy dewtye to do" [Cranmer.] Ellicott has "becoming."

(k) All the later English Versions, except the Rheims, copy this fine expression from Tyndale.

(l) By the comma between "such a one" and "as," I have meant to indicate, not decide, the question as to the relation of the expressions to each other. The sense, as unfolded in the note on the text, requires the other changes in the common punctuation, viz. a semicolon after "rather," and a comma merely at the end of the verse.

(m) Bishop Middleton (on the Greek Article, p. 809) animadvert on the Common Version here: "The rendering of Paul the aged, conveys the idea that the apostle was thus distinguished from others of the same name. The want of the article in the original shows that nothing of this kind was meant. Paul, an old man, is all that there appears." Dr. Wordsworth follows this criticism.

(n) The Greek idiom often implies εὐρί where we must insert the copula.

(o) Some revisers propose "heart" here, as in verses 7 and 20. It is a false rule that we must use the same English word always for the same Greek word. "Flesh" renders the translation susceptible of the two-fold construction that has been put whom I would have retained (p) 13 with myself, that in thy stead he might minister unto me in the bonds of the gospel. But without thy consent I desired to do nothing; that thy benefit (q) may not be as it were of necessity, but willingly. For perhaps he departed for a season to this end, (r) that thou shouldest receive him as thine for ever; (s) no longer as a servant, (t) but above a servant, a brother beloved, specially to me, but how much more to thee, both in the flesh, and in the Lord! If thou countest (u) me therefore a 17 on the original. It is thus left to the judgment of the reader, whether the idea is that of affection merely, [see Eph. v. 29] or that of kindredship at the same time.

(p) Tyndale, Cranmer, Geneva have "woide fayne have retayned." The Common Version agrees with the Rheims.

(q) The older translators explain the word: "the good thou doest" [Coverdale]; "that good which springeth of thee" [Tyndale]; "the good which thou doest" [Cranmer].

(r) "Therefore" [Common Version] is ordinarily retrospective, and would mislead or perplex most English readers.

(s) "Wholly and for ever" would also give the idea.

(t) For this translation see Dr. Conant's note on Mat. viii. 9. Slave—softened from sklave, and originally a national appellation, Sklavonic or Sclavonic—is comparatively a modern word in our language, and altogether too restricted to represent the Greek δούλος. Schmitthenner [Wörterbuch für Etymologie, p. 447] confirms this statement. Gibbon (Decline and Fall, chapter iv.) touches on the etymology of the term. All the versions in the English Hexapla render "servant" here. Cruden reports but two instances of the word "slave" in the entire English Bible [Jer. ii. 14 and Rev. xviii. 13, for σκῆπτρα] and he reports all the instances that there are. As their contemporaries, e. g. Shakespeare, employ the term often, our translators must have had special reasons for avoiding it. The reader will find a few words on the matter in Dean Trench's Authorized Version of the New Testament, p. 104. The topic deserves a fuller illustration than it has yet received.

(u) The Greek indicative demands the English indicative instead of the subjunctive, as in the Common Version. For the English forms after "if," see Latham on the English Language, sec. 614.

18 partner, (v) receive him as me. But (w) or oweth aught, put that (x) on my 19 account. I Paul hath written it with my own hand; I will repay.

Not (y) to say to thee that unto me thou owest (z) also thine own self be-

(v) The Hexapla Versions, except the Geneva and James', have "fellow;" with its varied orthography of the different periods. If we could restore that term, it would preserve admirably the correspondence between the concrete expression here, and the abstract in verse 6. Unfortunately, the word has acquired new shades of meaning, which unfit it for a use so entirely elevated as that required in this place.

(w) Though so many questions spring out of the original of this passage, it will be seen that they are not of a nature to affect the translation.

(x) The Greek has "this put," &c. [Ellicott's order, after most of the earlier English Versions,] but the difference is unimportant.

(y) "Albeit" has been silently exchanged for "although" in many copies of the English Bible, in passages where it is found in the original edition of 1611.

(z) "Unto me thou owest," is the Greek order, followed in the Peshito; and it may be as well to retain the emphasis in English.

tarchus, Demas, Luke, (c) my fellow-

Jesus Christ be with your spirit.

(a) See note on the Greek text.

(b) The inexact "trust," Common Version, which would be πίστεως, as in verse 21, reaches back to Tyndale. "Spiro" of the Vulgate, preserved Wiclif and the Rheims from that inadvertence.

(c) "Lucas," as in the Common Version, conceals from the reader that he is identical with Luke [Col. iv. 14, 2 Tim. iv. 11.] "Marcus" also should be Mark, in conformity with Acts xii. 25, xv. 39, 2 Tim. iv. 12, Common Version. Some would restore the Latinized form in all instances, but the other sounds have become too familiar to the English ear. Wiclif writes "Aristark" for Aristarchus.

BIBLE UNION AND REVISION.

MORE than ten years have passed away since the Bible Union was organized. We hailed the announcement of its formation with joy and delight, and without waiting to see whether it would be popular or unpopular, immediately advocated its claims, maintained, and defended it. From that time to the present we have been an unwavering friend, advocate, and defender of its great and, as we supposed, good object. Our reasons for advocating the Bible Union may be stated in a few words.

1. Its work, the translation of the Bible, with all possible correctness, for all the world, is unquestionably right and good in itself.

2. It declared itself unsectarian from the commencement.

3. The rules governing the translators were good.

4. As the work progressed, and incipient revisions appeared, we saw, as we thought, evidence of the unsectarian and honorable character of the work. The revisers appeared to rise above the mere partizan, and, following the rules which govern the translators, in some instances rendered words faithfully in places where it directly conflicted with the practice of the party with which the reviser stood identified. This was encouraging, and we considered that we were only true to the Lord, the Bible, and humanity, in advocating the claims of the Union. Thus far its working seemed to go well.

But certain things have appeared more recently, which throw doubt over the fair prospects of the enterprise, and are having tremendous influence on the public mind; and some relief must be afforded promptly, or this great and good work will suffer. We are truly sorry to call attention to it thus publicly, but the evil, or at least the supposed evil to which we allude, is public, and it must be reached in the same way.

1. The charge has been made, that the Bible Union was a Baptist enterprise. This charge has been repelled and repudiated, as we thought, faithfully and candidly, by the principal men in the Baptist ranks, in sermons, revision addresses, and publications. We have repeatedly, in the prints, sermons, and addresses, repudiated it. We did not believe it.

2. But what shall we say, now that we have baptizo rendered immerse, but baptist left untranslated? How shall we explain this, when we are assured that the reviser is a Baptist? What shall we answer, when we are further informed that he is a member of the Final Committee? Nay, more; what shall we say, when we learn that he is the leading spirit in the Final Committee?

3. Are we told that it is a small matter? True, it is in itself a small matter, and the version might be a good one with that blemish in it. But it will destroy confidence in the work. The matter is a plain one. Is the action performed immersion? Then he who performs the action is the immerser. What reason can we give for calling the action immersion, and terming him who performs it baptist, and not calling him immerser?

4. No man need tell Dr. Conant that every reason he has given for rendering baptizo "immerse," is equally as cogent a reason for rendering baptistees "immerser." This he knows as well as any man can know anything. Why, then, retain the Anglicized word baptist, and translate baptize? What reason can the friends of the Bible Union give for this?

5. The charge will be made—and who can repel it?—that it is, after all, a Baptist translation. Dr. Lillie, a Presbyterian, regardless of the practice of his church, though true to himself and his God, as an honest man, rendered baptizo "immerse." This will stand as a credit and an honor to him in all history. Dr. Conant followed him in this, but, less true and faithful to his trust, retains the word Baptist!

6. This he did, not only without a good reason, but in violation of one of the clearest rules governing the revisers. What defence can the friends of the enterprise make in this case? Are we to pacify the people by telling them that this is only an incipient revision? That would imply that we believe it will be changed; but what evidence have we that it will be changed? None in the world. It is from Dr. Conant, as we have observed—not only a member of the Final Committee, but emphatically the leading spirit—and he does not expect to be let down by having a change of that sort made.

7. Who has attended the revision meetings, and not heard the miserable cant and whining about the effect revision might have upon the name Baptist? Here has been the place where the chief fears have rested among Baptists who opposed the Bible Union. This has now been in the prints and speeches in all directions for the last ten years. How shall Bible Union men now make their defence, when the charge is made that this has been done to accommodate a prejudice? We can not deny that it does accommodate it. Shall we try to prove that it was not intended to accommodate it? That, in the nature of the case, we cannot prove. Shall we try to defend the translation? That we cannot do, for we do not believe it good. Shall we try to defend Dr. Conant, on the ground that he thought it was right? We cannot do that, without questioning his competency for the work; nor can we do it candidly, for we do not believe it.

Is it said that we are too hasty in this matter? We think not. There are thousands who have been warm friends of the enterprise, who have been ten long years giving their money and praying for its success, and who desire to give more money and continue their prayers for its completion, if carried through in the same manly, unsectarian, and independent spirit as commenced and continued up to the present difficulty, who have not another dollar nor prayer for the Union, if the work of sectarianism is to be stamped upon it, so that it cannot be defended as a manly, independent, and unsectarian work. They have sworn eternal hostility to sectarianism, in all its forms and phases, and committed themselves to the Bible and to the God of the Bible. They have no use for sectarianism, no use for men who are themselves sectarians, or will in any way cater or truckle to it. The Bible and its cause have no use for any such men, and will triumph without them and independent of them. We want a translation that is right — one that can be relied upon and defended — one that is simply a correct one, free from all bias to any sectarian peculiarities — and we will labor for such a version; but we will labor for no sectarian version, and we will defend and support no man who sacrifices his integrity to party prejudices. We desire that the work should be carried through upon principle, honor, and integrity, such as would be unimpeachable, so that we could stand upon the vantage ground and defend it. We are resolved that we will be committed to nothing short of this.

We have found it perfectly easy to defend the Bible Union all the way until this thing appeared. But here the cry of inconsistency arises from all quarters, and the charge of departing from your own principles rings in our ears. The enemy shouts, "We told you it would be a mere Baptist version." Who can reply to this? We cannot in the present state of affairs. We wait to see the result, and close by simply saying, that the work is suffering every day by suspense in this matter. We must know, before we proceed, whether independence is to be maintained. The matter is a plain one. There is no doubt about what is correct; and we have nothing at stake only to have what is consistent and right.

[We have selected the above important article from the Christian Review of June 19, in which it appears as an editorial, without the name or initials of the writer. We receive it as from the pen of our uncompromising brother, B. Franklin. Although we deeply regret the circumstance which has called forth these animadversions, yet we feel greatly obliged to the writer, for the stand he has thus made against the least infraction of the cardinal principle of the Bible Union — a faithful rendering in English of the originals of the Scriptures. We sincerely hope that the rebuke thus administered, as well as remonstrances from other quarters, will lead the Committee of the Bible Union to be prompt and faithful to their oft-repeated assurance, to give to the church of God and the world at large, a correct translation of every word found in the Sacred Writings. Anything short of this cannot be satisfactory to the Author of the Bible, or to the truly enlightened among men.]—J. W.

BACCALAUREATE ADDRESS

DELIVERED TO THE GRADUATING CLASS OF BETHANY OF 1860.

YOUNG GENTLEMEN:—The hill of science—perhaps, I might rather now say, the mountain of science—is a lofty eminence. And have you not realized the fact that "The steep ascent must be with toil subdued ;"

"Watchings and cares must win the lofty prize,

Proposed by heaven, true bliss, and real good.

Honor rewards the brave and bold alone,
It spurns the timorous, indolent, and base ;
Dangers and toils stand stern before its throne,

And guard, so God commands, the sacred place ;

Who seek it must the mighty cost sustain,
And pay the price of fame—labor, and care, and pain."

So sings one of our most philosophic and poetic rhymers. If this was true a hundred or two hundred years ago, it is still more truthful and apposite in this our day and generation.

The area of both learning and science—or language and all that it represents—has a species of geometrical progression indefinitely advanced beyond the old landmarks of both. The time is not so very long past when fire, air, earth, and water, were earth's four elements, and its all-engrossing themes. The word element has, indeed, itself become a theme, a philosophy. Our Saxon ancestors had a philosophy of elfs, representing four positive realities—a spirit, a ghost, a nightmare, and a witch. The elf, or el, became a genus, culminating in a moving principle. This word was, by almost common consent among the more learned, derived from the first syllable of Elohim—the gods. But this elf became plural—and getting into bad repute became a representative of a whole regiment of demons. Hence sprang the science or speculations of Demonology.

The veritable Parliament of Great Britain, in the reign of the first Charles, July 1st, A.D. 1643, held in Henry the Seventh Chapel, employed the authors of that work, and several of them were members of the assembly.*

The area of their operations were definitely propounded, beyond which their license and authority extended not. This was an unfortunate, ill-judged, and in the long run, an expedient eminently fatal to the progress of the gospel in the hearts of the people, and to the advancement of true science and true religion.

In harmony with the theory of the four elements, there were, by common consent, seven sciences. According to Dr. Johnson, these seven sciences were: "Grammar, Logic, Rhetoric, Arithmetic, Geometry, Astronomy, and Music." But are not Geology, Mineralogy, Botany, Sciagraphy, sciences? Nay, in one word, has not every art its own science, and every science its own art? Are there not, in one sentence, just as many arts as sciences?

But again, with the philosophic poet, may we not enquire:

"Is not all nature art unknown to thee,
All chance, direction which thou can'st not see,
All discord, harmony not understood,
All partial evil, universal good?"

From the same sweet rhyming and philosophic poet we propound to you and to ourself the all-absorbing and engrossing exclamations:—

"Oh, happiness! our being's end and aim!
Good, pleasure, ease, content, whate'er thy name!
That something still which prompts th' eternal sigh,

* See Encyclopædia of Religious Knowledge—on the preaching of said assembly.

For which we bear to live, or dare to die;
Which still so near us, yet beyond us lies.
O'erlooked, seen double, by the fool and wise.

Plant of celestial seed, if dropped below,
Say in what mortal soil thou deign'st to grow?

Fair opening to some courts, propitious shine,

Or deep with diamonds, in the flaming mine?
Twin'd with the wreaths Parnassian laurels yield,

Or reap'd in iron harvests of the field?
Where grows? where grows it not? If vain our toil,

We ought to blame the culture, not the soil:
Fix'd to no spot is happiness sincere;
'Tis nowhere to be found, or everywhere;
'Tis never to be bought, but always free,
And fled from monarchs, good man! dwells with thee.

Ask of the learn'd the way? the learned are blind;

This bids to serve, that to shun mankind:
Some place the bliss in action, some in ease,
Those call it pleasure, and contentment these;

Some sunk to beasts, find pleasure end in pain;

Some swail'd to gods, confess e'en virtue vain!

Or indolent to each extreme they fall,
To trust in everything—or doubt of all."

This beautiful rhymer reasons like a man of genius and of taste. We cannot, indeed, indorse him in all his beautiful verses—but we can find him in his Essay on Man a philosopher, at least of as much sound reason, good practical sense, and discretion, as any other poet of the age in which he lived.

While by no means endorsing his theological opinions, or, indeed, the whole of his philosophy, we must do his memory the justice, and you the justice, to say that he has very happily and truthfully expressed himself in the verses quoted; and being easily memorized, they will amply repay, in their future suggestions, all the expense incurred by transcribing them deeply on the tablet of your memory.

Every student that has attained to a collegiate literary and scientific majority—usually called graduation, or the receiving of academical degrees—is merely licensed to become his own teacher and pupil. And let me say, kindly and emphatically say, that you owe to God, to society, to your Alma Mater, and to yourselves, to continue to be students in a very large school.

possessing an immense library, a splendid apparatus, and a very large and highly gifted faculty, each and every one of which is a Pantomimist, so-called from Pantomimus, who could represent all sorts of actions and characters without speaking one word, expressing his meaning in mute action.

One of these, if my recollections of my early readings be not treacherous, once challenged Marcus Tullius Cicero, the father of Latin eloquence, the greatest Roman orator to whom the Roman State ever gave birth — great, not only in oratory, but what was then called Roman Philosophy; I say he challenged Cicero to appear before a Roman audience on any occasion, on any subject, proposing that Cicero should address them in their own language for any given period, and that he would respond in Pantomime in his own style, without uttering a syllable or a sound, and that, too, to the general satisfaction, conviction, and persuasion of a Roman auditory.

Be this literally true or not, it is true that there is pertinent or appropriate action, much significance, much pathos, and, therefore, much power to impress, to allure, and to conquer an intellectual and intelligent auditory.

To command the tongue and the pen, are two of the greatest achievements that a literary and scientific education can confer. But they are always obtained at a high price — a price that would more than bankrupt the all-potential house of the Rothschilds. Genius, ratiocination, imagination, eloquence, and philosophy are no more to be purchased by money than was the supernatural influence of the Holy Spirit displayed in Jerusalem on the ever memorable Pentecostal day. Money commands only materialisms, or the means of obtaining, holding, and enjoying the materialities of earth.

Spiritual gifts and graces, the Bible affirms, are not to be purchased with money, nor with anything that money commands. We may purchase a Bible with money, so much, and so far as its materialities are concerned. But we cannot purchase a single grace or gift that it reveals to man with all the gold and precious gems of the great globe on which we live, and from which we derive our animal subsistence.

The spiritual stature of man never was and never can be appreciated by himself while veiled in an animal body. Our literary and scientific studies and attainments in this life, and on this earth, are, therefore, one and all, but rudimental and elementary. We merely apprehend symbols, but do not comprehend the realities of which they are the symbols. It is the knowledge of things, and not of symbols, that elevates, aggrandizes, and beatifies man.

The sciences of all nature, and all the languages of earth, did we fully comprehend them, would not, could not satisfy, much less satiate, the appetencies and cravings of our nature. So great is the human mind, so large is the human heart, that nothing finite, transient, or material, can ever, by any possibility, afford true and real satisfaction. Nothing on this side of the infinite, the eternal, and the immutable, can meet the longings, the appetencies, and the aspirations of our nature.

God created but one image of himself. Angels are not images of God as man is. Man has in himself a trinity. And he alone of all creation is an image of God, in a union of a body, a soul, and a spirit. We have never seen, outside of man, this trinity in one personality. The schools of theology have a trinity of personalities, but not a trinity of natures. We have an animal body, we have an animal soul, and we have an intellectual, moral, and religious spirit. These all meet and culminate in man. And in man alone do these three natures meet. In our Creator there are three personalities in one nature. In man there are three natures in one personality.

In every school there ought to be a Bible. And in every college there should be a development of three sciences — Anthropology, Theology, and Christology. We are happy to find these three words in Webster's Dictionary. The text-book for these three sciences, and the only one that is perfect and complete, is that Book of books, most appropriately called the Book—o Biblos.

"The Bible should be the standard of language as well as of faith." So says Noah Webster, L.L.D. "Member of the American Philosophical Society, in Philadelphia; Fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, in Massachusetts; Member of the Connecticut Academy of Arts and Sciences; Fellow of the Royal Society of Northern Antiquaries, in Copenhagen ; Member of the Connecticut Historical Society ; Corresponding Member of the Historical Societies in Massachusetts, New York, and Georgia ; of the Academy of Medicine in Philadelphia, and of the Columbian Institute in Washington, and Honorary Member of the Michigan Historical Society." And revised, too, and enlarged by Chauncy A. Goodrich, Professor in Yale College, A.D. 1848.

I do not say as some poetaster rhymers has said :—

" Let all foreign tongues alone Till you can read and write your own."

For in that case I should fear you could never master your own nor any other. Your classic attainments are valuable only as you employ them. And, indeed, the more you employ them the more can you, and the more will you, appreciate your own vernacular. Still, science is superior to literature ; for literature, at most, is merely the handmaid to science. And of all sciences, the science of God and the science of man are unquestionably perfectly transcendental. The universe, to an enlightened man, is but a commentary upon the Bible. It is transcendently important to us at this angle of vision.

The Bible puts a tongue into the universe and makes it vocal and eloquent, to praise and magnify the name and character of Jehovah. What a splendid speech was that which made nothing the mother of everything that exists in creation's boundless area ! It awoke music in the whole universe. The morning stars sang together in one creation-thrilling anthem, and " all the sons of God," in all the realms of the universe, " shouted for joy." The echoes of that hymn still vibrate through every nerve of animated nature, and the dying echo has not ceased to thrill the sensitive heart responsive to the still small voice which Elijah heard when he wrapped his face in a mantle, and stood in the entrance of a cave while the glory of the Lord passed before his enraptured vision.

Having attained to your literary majority — licensed now to appear in the more active scenes of the great drama of human life—let me acceptably utter a few parting words.

The proper field of human action is humanity—not "humanities," as used and understood in the Scotch universities — indicating, in the plural form, philology, grammar, logic, rhetoric, poetry, the Latin and Greek languages. Not these, but the exercise of kindness, acts of compassion, tenderness, benevolence—a general and a generous sympathy ; or, as Paul expounds it, " Rejoicing with them that rejoice, and weeping with them that weep"—kindly affectionate towards one another—not every one seeking his own interests and honor, but the interest and honor one of another. A Pagan of noble port and bearing, on being interrogated because of his very generous liberality, responded : " I desire, Sir, very much deaire, to be like the gods." "Wherein, Sir, or in what respect?" was the next interrogation. " Why, Sir," said he, " the gods give to all who ask, and receive from none anything in return"—sometimes not even gratitude itself.

Be it fable, or be it fact, it is a noble conception, and often an apropos suggestion. There is an unquestionable magnanimity and nobility in liberality. " The liberal soul waxeth fat, and he that waters others, shall himself be watered in return." Goodness, absolute goodness, infinite goodness, is ever radiating being and blessedness from the centre to the circumference of creation's area.

" For, what is evil but the shade
By wisdom in the picture laid ?
While all were good no need could be
For mercy's aid to misery.

Nor yet could sin-forgiving grace
Among all creatures find a place, While all were good ; no room could be
For mercy's aid to misery."

Liberty and necessity in moral science, or rather in metaphysics, have long been, and are still mooted questions. We shall not, of course, presume to discuss them on this occasion.

Freedom of thought, of speech, and of action on all subjects connected with religion, morality, and politics, are the constitutional rights and privileges of every citizen. We thank God, from whom all blessings flow, for these invaluable birthrights, privileges, and honors. We have, however, to regret that the rights of man are more generally and cordially discussed and debated, than the rights of God. Yet the knowledge and the recognition of these divine rights to the allegiance of our hearts and lives to our God and to our Redeemer, contributes superlatively more to our dignity, honor, and happiness, than do all our politically-guaranteed social rights and privileges.

But to be citizens of Christ's own spiritual kingdom in all its birth-rights, honors, and immunities — to be joint-heirs with him of all the riches, honors, and blessings of his celestial empire, and to obtain to the rank of sons of God, and joint heirs with the Lord Messiah, King of kings and Lord of lords, inexpressibly transcends any and every object that comes within the area of the desires, the hopes, or the aspirations of mortal man.

They look in vain for true happiness, honour, dignity, and glory, who imagine that these blessings and enjoyments are to be found, or to be secured, in earthly courts, dignities, and honours. They are not to be expected there in the ordinary routine of human affairs and relations.

The honours, immunities, riches, and glories of citizenship in Christ's own kingdom are, in the judgment of all truly educated and illuminated men, the ne plus ultra of all legitimate aspirations and ambition. There is a holy, and there is an unholy covetousness, aspiration, and ambition. According to the Apostle Paul it is even a virtue to "covet earnestly the best gifts." He, therefore, exhorts Christians to "covet to prophecy"—or to interpret the Divine Oracles.

One of our most gifted bards and devout poets has wisely said :—

"Thou shalt not covet," is a wise command,
But bounded by the wealth the Sun surveys:
Look farther, the command stands quite reversed,
And avarice is a virtue most divine."

Covet usefulness. Lay not your books upon the shelf. But the Book of books — the Book of life eternal — make it your councillor and companion. Whatever your calling or profession in this world may be, act with special reference to the closing scene of earth's drama, and to the eternal future of your being. Of acting thus, no man at the close of life ever regretted, no man ever repented that he had made God's Book of life eternal his intimate friend, his guide-book and companion.

That such may be your purpose, aim, and object, and that your success in such a course may be all that you or we could lawfully wish, is not my desire only, but also that, I presume to say, of every member of the Faculty of Bethany College.

FATHER THOMAS CAMPBELL.—LETTER FROM WALTER SCOTT.

[At my suggestion, my Sister Bryant addressed a letter to our much-esteemed and beloved brother, Walter Scott, requesting from him any facts or documents connected with the life and labors of Father Thomas Campbell, during his acquaintance with him, which was very intimate for some years. As we are slowly progressing with the memoirs of his life and labors, we insert the following letter received from Bro. Walter Scott, as we are soliciting such documents from those who labored with him at the commencement of the current Reformation. Will not our friends, and the friends of the cause we plead, favor us in like manner?—A. C.]

MAYS LICK, KY. 8th May, 1860.

MRS. BRYANT.—Very dear Sister: The Lord bless you and yours—the Lord make you a blessing to many people.

Your letter of the 25th ult. unexpected but not unwelcome, was duly received. These lines in answer to it, go, I trust, to find all the friends in Bethany in good health.

Touching the matter whereof you wrote to me, I am, I regret to say, in possession of no documents or incidents that you would deem of any value in a biography of Father Campbell; both of our families resided for some time in different apartments of the same house, he and I taught the same school, and presided together as bishops in the same church, Pittsburg; and therefore, upon continuous reflection, some incidents might occur to my memory which time has long obliterated.

I made the acquaintance of your brother Alexander, in 1821-2; and soon after that had the pleasure, at his suggestion, I presume, of a visit from your dear and venerable father. In his case, as in that of his son, we at once conceived an ardent Christian affection for each other, which, by the way, continued uninterrupted and unabated while he tarried on earth.

Alas! where now is the venerable man—the man of God, and the holy ones who, under his pastoral care, among the cabins of Western Pennsylvania and Western Virginia, worshipped the God of our salvation? Gone, all gone,

“And left us weeping on the shore
To which they will return no more.”

“The righteous perish and no man layeth it to heart.” A sense of these melancholy changes diffuses a copious and doleful gloom over my affections and heart, and impel me to indulge for the moment in an involuntary and unavailing tear. I think of your mother, I think of your father, I think of Alicia, of Thomas, of yourself, and others, and my heart dies within me in memory of days that are past. May grace, mercy, and peace be with those who still linger behind.

Since Father Campbell was so much better known to you all than to me, it would be improper in me to attempt, for your benefit, a description of his excellencies, either intellectual, moral, social, or religious; and yet I may, perhaps, state in a few words without presumption, how he appeared to me under these several phases.

I always regarded your father as a man of fine intellectual parts. The evidence of this was derived to me from two sources, sense and reason—the eye and the ear. It was impossible to look upon his lofty brows and facial lines of thought, without reading in these exterior symbols, intellectual greatness—reason, robust common sense, capacity, skill, wisdom. “The trial of a man is his speech,” says the son of Sirach. Your father’s public efforts fully vindicated, by the apocalypse they made of truth, all first impressions. Sometimes he spoke with great effect, and though he often protracted his speech to a great length—the manners and the taste of the times demanding it—yet he did not do so always. I once heard him in my academy, which was large, deliver a current commentary on James, first chapter; and can say in regard to it, that I have not since that time listened to anything in the way of teaching more beautiful in expression or in thought and reason, more delightful and ravishing.

He was fond of discussion, and frequently offered propositions for debate. On such occasions he was a little sensitive and high-spirited. Amid the affray of words and arguments which his genius for dialectics had waked up, he ever held his old gold snuff-box in his hand, and snatching thence, at unequal intervals, “a hasty pinch” of the good old Scotch, as Henry Clay called it, he would immediately renew the conflict with increased energy.

He was, of course, fond of head-work. His intellectual system could not lay idle. He engaged its forces in various ways, therefore—abstract thought, reflection, meditation, lucubration, contemplation, and excogitation—so that sometimes he looked pensive, sad, cast down, melancholy. Such appeared to me, intellectually, your pious and enlightened father. Those who think your brother’s strong intellectual qualities were not derived to him from his father, differ from me toto caelo.

Touching his practical nature, its basis seemed moral rather than sentient. His affections were, therefore, stirred from within rather than from without, and shone forth in respect for the rights of others, rather than in excitability for their faults. He was patient more than impressible; meek, gentle, and resigned, more than passionate or easily provoked. He wished well to all the world, whose salvation he desired, and loved with unspeakable complacency his neighbors, his family, and the saints.

Though his nature, as I have said, was affectionate rather than sensitive, yet his sympathies could be stirred up to floods of tears by the occasion; and of this the following is a proof. Our preaching had one day taken such fast hold on the heart of a certain lady, as to produce a slight alienation of mind, which, on our return, we learned had continued for a week. At the end of that time, on a second visit, many people offered themselves for the obedience of faith, and were baptized. On the conclusion of this beautiful scene, the said lady pushed herself close up to my side until, indeed, she almost leant upon me. All the people saw her, and every heart was touched, for she spoke not a word. Father Campbell stood as close to my person as the lady herself. Looking upon the countenance of my venerable co-laborer, I said to him—My dear father, if the Word of God has perturbed the soul of this poor lady, may not the same Word also, under other circumstances, tranquillize it? "Brother Scott," he said, "baptize her."—Turning to the woman, I took the confession, and asked her if she repented of her sins. Without lifting her eyes from the ground, on which they were fixed, she replied, "I have repented most wonderfully." On the utterance of these most extraordinary words, a flood of tears gushed from the eyes of my venerable associate, as if his head had been a fountain of water. They absolutely fell in a stream to the ground. The memory of the fact must remain with me through life. I baptized the lady, and thanks be to God, she awoke next morning in the full possession of her senses.

In regard to his feelings, derived from the opinion of others, he was by no means insensible to fame. If, however, this "last infirmity of noble mind" at any time perturbed his feelings or awakened his ambition, he sought not earthly renown for its own sake, if he sought it at all. If he desired to be known, it was as a herald of the cross of Christ—a reformer of the church and of the world.

He had, as a scholar, mingled with the aristocracy of his own native land; and without contracting any of their luxurious habits, had come off victorious from the contact, impressed only with the grace and elegance of their lordly address. He was one of the best bred men of his day.

At an early date I returned his visit, and tarried some days and nights under his sacred roof. Here his social affections displayed themselves in the most agreeable involuntary hospitality. His great nature overflowed in affability and in the arts of pleasing—conversation, reading, happy discussions on pleasing themes, walking abroad, &c. In all he did and said, he offered me a pleasing illustration of the Scripture which says, "He pleased not himself."

Touching his religion, he was the most devout man I ever knew. He loved God and adored him for the gift of his Son in our redemption. He was a man of prayer, a man of reading, a man of holy meditation, excogitation, and reformation. He was fond of analogies between the two Divine Systems—nature and religion; and read with delight in the works of God the spiritual relations of the universe. He ascended from infinite power to infinite wisdom, from infinite wisdom to infinite goodness, and read and realized in the things that are seen the things that are not seen, but yet eternal. All things he saw with delight were made for man, and man for his Maker. He ascended, then, by nature and religion, up to the God of nature and religion. He had tasted of the sovereign and universal good, and his heart was in the heavens. He was the most exemplary man I ever saw. His memory was blest.

NEW TESTAMENT PERIODS.—No. VII.

THE BEGINNING OF THE SIXTH PERIOD.

A TREATISE upon the Dispensation of Favor is not designed. We have only wished to trace the preparatory periods down to the establishment of the church, or kingdom. The after-fortunes of the church, and its conflicts, progress and apostacies, are, to some extent, to be traced in the ponderous histories of the church. They cannot be noted here. We are, for all practical utility, more interested in "the beginning," than with all that follows concerning the church in her militant state. Here we have a model church, and a model gospel. Jerusalem is preferable to Rome, Geneva, or Oxford. The twelve are to be preferred above all who have written or spoken since their day. Their inspiration towers to the heavens above all the concentrated wisdom of all the Councils and Assemblies, which have convened since the Nicene convention, down to the present. To find the beginning of church, to find the "setting up of the kingdom," is to hold the "key of knowledge," as to a proper understanding of

New Testament. He must blunder, and ever blunder, who has not the beginning of Christ's own church properly dated. He will blunder in reference to the proper regulation of the church, in reference to the induction into it, and perchance, in reference to the name its members should wear. Exemplifications of this are abundant.

We have arrived at Pentecost, the fiftieth day from the "morrow after the Sabbath" of the feast of the Passover, and the fiftieth day from the resurrection morn. Jews, from every nation, are again assembled at Jerusalem. The disciples are still waiting for the "promise of the Father." The Holy Spirit descends, and a sound is heard from heaven, as a rushing mighty wind. It fills the house where the disciples are convened. All Jerusalem hears it, and all the Jews who had come up to the feast. The crowds are attracted to the sound, and to the place where the disciples are sitting. Cloven tongues like fire appear upon each of the disciples, and they speak the "wonderful works of God" in every dialect represented at the feast. "What meaneth this?" inquire the astonished Jews. The story is soon told by Peter:—"Jesus, whom ye crucified, has arisen—he has ascended to heaven—he is constituted Lord and Christ—and himself has shed forth this which ye see and hear." The evidence is overwhelming, and three thousand bow to the mandate of the newly exalted King.

On earth Christ had been condemned before two courts; but the case had been carried to the Supreme Tribunal of the Universe, and the decision is reversed; and now, the Holy Spirit this day descends, bearing with him the upper verdict. He comes to proclaim the innocence and triumph of Jesus—to justify him on earth as he had been justified in the heavens. How fitting the occasion! At a great festival where Jews from every nation were present; when the same people, who, but fifty-three days previously, had acquiesced in the judgment of condemnation, crying, "Crucify him! crucify him!" were again convened, the sin of the murderers was boldly announced, and his triumph and Messiahship surely demonstrated, by the incontestible, visible demonstrations of the Holy Spirit.

That the kingdom of heaven was upon that day set up, that the church

then had its beginning, we have already anticipated, in proof, to some extent. At least, we have shown that the church did not exist prior to that time. This is evident from the preaching of the Baptist—from the preaching of Christ—of the Twelve—of the Seventy, and from the coronation and priesthood of Christ. It now falls in the way to offer additional testimony. Let the reader remember that there are several terms, which, though not equivalent in meaning, refer to the same thing—in other words, they are all used in reference to the new and better institution; such as church, kingdom, body, temple, house, covenant, testament, or will, &c. So that we can use either of these terms in determining the "beginning."

I. Micah's testimony: "But in the last days it shall come to pass that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established on the top of the mountains, and exalted above the hills; and people shall flow into it. * * * The law shall go forth out of Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem" (Micah iv. 1, 2.) "Jerusalem" was the place: the period, "last days," was the time, when the mountain (a title given by the Spirit to government) of the Lord's house should be established, and when the word of the Lord and the law should go forth from Jerusalem and Zion. That this refers to the gospel of the commission, which should begin at Jerusalem and go into all the world, there can be no doubt; and it is equally clear that a government was now established. Micah is clear upon this point: see 8th v. "And thou, O tower of the flock, the stronghold of the daughter of Zion, unto thee shall it come, even the first dominion; the kingdom shall come to the daughter of Jerusalem." He not only testifies that the kingdom shall come to Jerusalem; but, lest men should think that it was previously established at some other place, he says, the first dominion of the kingdom shall come to Jerusalem. And all this took place in "the last days," when Joel said the Spirit should come, which was at Pentecost. This beautifully corresponds with what the Saviour said to his disciples—"The kingdom shall come with power"—and, "Ye shall receive power after that the Holy Spirit is come upon you."

II. Another argument is drawn from the words of Isaiah : " Behold I lay in Zion, for a foundation, a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner-stone, a sure foundation : he that believeth shall not make haste " (Isa. xxviii. 16.)

Here are two declarations, which will serve as land-marks to enable us to determine the time of the laying of this foundation stone ; and surely the church was not built before the corner-stone was laid.

1. It was to be laid in Zion. This word may be applied to different things, as the church itself, and also to heaven, and it is used interchangeably with the literal Jerusalem. The foundation was not laid in the church ; for the foundation was before the church, and not the church before the foundation. The foundation was not laid in heaven, or the church in its militant state could not have been builded upon it. It was laid in the literal Jerusalem, where Micah said, the " first dominion " should come.

2. The foundation was to be a tried stone. There is a deep meaning in this language. Before He, who is the foundation, was laid as such in Zion, he was tried by all the powers of darkness—by sin and death. This trial was only consummated in his resurrection triumph, and not till the last test had been applied is he made the sure foundation of the Spiritual Temple.

III. Another argument is based on the language of Peter :—" This is the stone which was set at naught of you builders, which is become the head of the corner " (Acts iv. 12.) " Rejected of the builders, " is the language of the Psalmist. It was not till after Christ was " set at naught, " " rejected " of the Jewish Scribes and Priests, that God placed him at the head of the corner. But the great consummating act in his rejection was condemning him to death. Hence it follows, that after his death, and not before, was he placed at the head of the corner.

IV. When the mission of Christ on earth was drawing to a close, he said to his disciples, " On this rock I will build my church. " The building of the church was, at that time, in the future, if there be meaning in language. We may here look to Paul to settle two questions :—What is the foundation ? How was it laid ? He answers—" Other foundation can no man lay, than is laid, which is Jesus Christ. " Does God use instrumentalities in laying this foundation ? " I, as a wise master-builder, have laid the foundation " (i. e. at Corinth.) How did you lay the foundation at Corinth ? By preaching :—" I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ and him crucified. " Then to lay the foundation was to preach a crucified Redeemer. Now if we can determine where any wise master-builder first preached Christ, in his true and proper character, as a crucified Saviour, to the world, we shall have determined when this foundation was first laid, and where the church began. In the same connection, where he says, " I will build my church, " he charges his disciples—" Tell no man that I am the Christ. " Hence, as builders, they never could lay the foundation till a permit, as authoritative as the prohibition, was given them. But never till the memorable Pentecost did they announce Jesus in his true character ; and hence, not till this day was the foundation laid, and the church built.

V. In connection with the declaration already noticed, Christ said to Peter, " I will give to thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven ; " indicative of the power to be invested in him to declare the means of induction into the church. Those who talk about the church and kingdom before Pentecost, have forgotten to tell us about the " keys. "—Who had them ?—who introduced subjects into the kingdom ?—who had the keys before Peter ? We have read enough about the successors of Peter, and about their holding the keys ; we are now prepared to receive a lesson from some pre-Pentecost-kingdom advocate as to Peter's predecessor ! And if he had none, what availed the kingdom without a way of getting into it ? At Pentecost these keys were used, the kingdom then was opened, and its doors have stood open ever since. If John the Baptist opened the door, who shut it for Peter to open again ?

VI. If we look at the two institutions, the Jewish and the Christian, we find that the first was taken away in order to establish the second. But the first was taken away by the death of Christ ; and hence, the second was subsequently established.

VII. If we use the term Will, or Testament, as does the apostle, we shall read that the New Testament — the Will and Testament of Jesus — was never in force while Christ, the Testator, was living; but after his death. By this Will, Paul says, we are sanctified. It is the Will of the Great Testator in reference to the world's salvation. The Master himself worded it, and signed it—his blood ratified it—the Apostles were the chosen Executors, and at Pentecost the seal was first broken, and its stipulations read to the world. "Gifts to men" were proffered, and the terms upon which they could be received were plainly read out.

Here is the beginning — here is the kingdom—here is the church—here is the New and blood-sealed Covenant—here, for the first time, is the Gospel, in all its fulness, proclaimed—here repentance and remission of sins are first preached in the name of Jesus. The names of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, are now, for the first, used in connection with the baptism of proper subjects; for here are the first acts of those who received the great commission.

The Sun, in his mid-day splendour, no more certainly reveals physical objects, than do rays of truth concentrate upon the Pentecost of the year, A. D. 33, as the birth-day of the Christian Institution. A. C.—N.

EVIDENCES OF CHRISTIANITY.—No. II. MYSTERIES IN THE BIBLE.

THE mysteries of the Bible are evidences of its divinity—some things in it beyond the comprehension of the mightiest intellects of our race, leading us on from the comprehensible to the infinite—from temporal to eternal realities. The volume of nature as well as revelation abounds in mystery. Still, everything ESSENTIAL to man's physical growth is remarkably plain in nature; and, connected with this beautiful development of God's goodness and power, many things beyond the power of finite capacity appear. So in that richest boon to man — the volume of revelation, giving in bold and original style man's origin, duty, as well as eternal destiny. ALL things necessary to man's salvation from sin are so plain that "wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein;" but in doing this many incidentals incomprehensible by man may occur. The fact of Christ's humanity and divinity is clearly revealed, but how they were associated can never be fathomed by finite capacity.

There are only three avenues through which light is claimed in regard to man's spiritual wants, namely:—reason, nature, and revelation. Let us examine the oracles of reason and nature, and see whether they depose definitely in relation to man's duty or destiny. Without endeavouring to examine the matter minutely, we would declare that unaided reason is incompetent to the task of guiding man safely, piloting man over the sea of human life. To illustrate this matter: there would be as much wisdom in the fact of a person sitting quietly and with composure, because he had a complete set of tools for the construction of an edifice to shelter him from the storm. The tools could do no good without materials, and the drenching rain might arouse him to the fact of the looseness of his logic. Reason is, in relation to facts, precisely similar. It has no province or power to act without them. But have facts? Then reasoning correctly, our conclusions are infallible. Reason cannot originate facts. So in religion: facts must be presented, then credibility being established by supernatural, physical, and intellectual power, called miracles, addressed to the senses of living, the credential by a process of reasoning being declared divine, we take the message upon authority.

Nature's light is too faint and flickering to guide man through the mazes of his earthly pilgrimage. The volume is everlastingly sealed without an infallible interpreter. The Pagans had learned the existence of God by tradition, before left to the revelations of nature, and with all this auxiliary to spiritual advancement, the Polytheistic world has gone down to more complete barbarism and moral putrefaction; and in the renowned Athens there were at one time no less than 30,000 gods, and it was easier to find a god than a man.

If, then, reason and nature fail to guide man correctly, we then inevitably have a revelation from God, or continually wander in darkness. It is claimed that there is such a book, and after canvassing certain objections urged against it, we propose examining the evidence of its authenticity and inspiration.

The Bible is divided into two departments, creation and redemption.

First objection in the department of creation: Why create man subject to moral evil, and then arrange a remedy? Answer: Why create man subject to hunger and thirst, and then create a remedy? How many helpless beings suffer the terrible death of starvation by this arrangement? How many thousands during the devastating effects of famine have gone into untimely graves, because the cravings of the appetite could not be satisfied. Why did God make man thus, knowing that this would be the inevitable result? Or, to put the question in another form: Why create man capable of sinning? Answer: In this we see the superiority of man over the brute creation—the impress of divinity is upon him, since he has a will governing the dominion of his own body. Had he not the capacity to do wrong, there would be no virtue in doing right. Right and wrong are relative terms; the one implies the other—the one cannot exist without the other. The acts of God are in no sense right, because he cannot do wrong—they are like himself, divine.

Objection second: Why create man, if the masses (as the Bible is said to teach) are rushing on to endless ruin? So far from that being the fact finally, prophetic declarations indicate that the kingdom of the living God, though commencing with a little stone cut out from the mountains without hands, shall finally fill the world, thus illustrating the universality of the principles of Jesus, and foreshadowing the millennial reign. Again, the Lord knowing that one person would suffer the most terrible death for ever, would he have created man?

Answer: Collect together suffering humanity from the four quarters of the globe, afflicted with the infirmities incident to our race, disease assailing the citadel of life, torturing man indescribably, and as we have these unfortunate mortals assembled in one vast charnel-house of despair—their wailings forming a chorus of woe—saluting the ear of the Eternal; is it possible, in view of all this, that he would have created man? And upon the same principle that the Lord looks upon this physical torture—man having broken physical laws—will he not look upon his eternal anguish, he having disregarded spiritual laws?

The department of redemption. First objection: Is it not strange that we should have spiritual life through the death and sufferings of Jesus? Answer: Is it not equally wonderful that we enjoy physical life by one continual slaughter of the animal and vegetable kingdoms; and if this is the ordained plan of God in the kingdom of nature, is it more wonderful in the kingdom of grace? Principles have no magnitude. He that is unjust in the least is unjust in much.

Objection second: It looks unreasonable that divinity should assume our nature. Answer: a message was to be brought to man—it could not be reached upon correct principles only through this nature. Secondly, our nature sinned and was condemned—the same nature must suffer, that the law of God might be properly respected. Our nature, too, must arise from the dead, to establish the possibility of the resurrection of our race—a fact no more wonderful and strange than the change from the loathsome caterpillar to the beautiful butterfly, its migration as well as appearance being radically changed.

May the Lord give us wisdom to read this wonderful book, so full of rich spiritual treasures, containing the title-deed of eternal life to as many as will receive it!

REPENTANCE AND CONVERSION.—No. II.

REPENTANCE.

OUR object in this paper is to show from passages in the New Testament, that repentance embraces the results of a change of mind upon the subject of sin, as well as the change in the mind; that when a man has changed his mind, he cannot be said to have repented, unless he carry out his new convictions into practice. Indeed, it does not seem reasonable, that the result of a change of mind should be classed under any other name than that which caused the change of conduct.

We will first cite John. His mission embraced a call for repentance (Mark i. 4, Mat. iii. 2, Acts xix. 4.) What was involved in it is plainly illustrated in Luke iii. 10 to 14. The people, the publicans, and the soldiers, were all directed to duties of an eminently practical nature, as being fruits meet for, or suitable manifestations of, repentance. The condition in which they would be if they carried out John's precept, is plainly stated to be a state of repentance (Mat. iii. 11.) "I (John) indeed baptize you in water unto repentance." Hence his baptism was called the baptism of repentance (Mark i. 4, Acts xix. 4.) The complaint of John against the Jews was only in reference to their moral conduct — not their religious worship. We have no indication of the introduction of an erroneous form. Jesus indeed complains that the Pharisees made the Law void by their tradition — crippling and nullifying it, in fact, by their additions to it; but he and John call them hypocrites, implying a recognition of some degree of truth in the form. John had no authority to interfere with religious forms. He proclaimed in fact, "Purify your life and morals, and believe on him whom I point out as the Messiah." The burden of his cry was, therefore, simply, "Repent, for the kingdom of God is at hand." The command to convert, did not issue to the Jews until they were commanded to turn from Moses as their religious guide, to Christ as the crucified one.

Jesus in his teachings frequently refers to repentance. Luke xv. contains three beautiful parables illustrative of its thoroughly practical character. He did not convey any idea to the Jews in them of a change of worship, but simply a falling away from the paths of virtue. Hence he uses the simple word repentance, as conveying all his meaning—"I say unto you that likewise joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that needeth repentance, more than over ninety and nine just persons who need no repentance." No use or need of the word "convert" here, as his object was not to speak of the form of worship, for the publicans and sinners went equally with the pharisees to worship in the temple; but he assumed that they had, as the Pharisees declared, fallen away from the paths of virtue, and he describes their return by the word "repentance," and justifies his acceptance of them on this simple ground. In many other passages Jesus makes the same use of this word, as Luke xiii. 3, xvi. 30, xvii. 3; Mat. xi. 20, xii. 41. These passages show that the word embraces everything generally classed under conversion.

We will now turn to the Acts of the Apostles and Epistles, and see what they teach us in regard to this word. It is certainly by the apostolic use of it that we are to be guided in our preaching and teaching. Reformation of character, as it is the great end of all God's communications and commands to man, so a command to reform must stand first in preaching. The preceding remarks abundantly prove that John and Jesus used the word repent in the sense of reform, and there is nothing in the nature of the gospel to lead us to suppose the Apostles would use it only in its primitive sense of a change of mind. Sorrow for sin gives but a faint and partial idea of repentance in its fulness. Indeed, it can hardly be regarded as meaning repentance at all, if we look at Paul's words, 2nd Cor. vii. 8, 9, 10, 11. There sorrow for their faults is spoken of as working repentance. "Godly sorrow worketh repentance to salvation not to be repented of." This last word is quite different in the original, and means, to be concerned about a thing after it is done. That is, to be sorry for having done it. It is used Mat. xxi. 29. The son who had refused to do his father's bidding was afterwards sorry for having refused, he was concerned about it, and went and did it. This word answers far better to the popular idea of repentance than the one under consideration. This sorrow is here spoken of as preceding repentance, working it out and perfecting it, as is powerfully described in the 11th verse. "For behold this selfsame thing, that you sorrowed after a godly sort, what carefulness it wrought in you, yea, what clearing of yourselves, yea, what indignation, yea, what fear, yea, what vehement desire, yea, what zeal, yea, what revenge!" In other words, what re-penance, or reformation. It is true this passage has reference to Christians, men who had previously believed the gospel; but we consider it a fair illustration of the nature of repentance.

Bearing this passage in mind, let us now turn to the 2nd of Acts. The preaching of Peter had caused a great change in the Jews who heard him preach. They were pricked to their hearts—they were in deep distress of mind—they sorrowed for what they had done—they now knew themselves to be sinners, and cried out, "What shall we do?" Did Peter tell them to do what they were doing—to sorrow for their sins? Neither he nor any of the Apostles ever commanded a sinner to be sorry for his sins. Sorrow for sins is a feeling endured in the mind by the force of truth alone. When that feeling is brought into existence, then comes the command, repent, or reform. This is what Peter told the Jews on that day; as if he had said, "You are concerned about what you have done; let your sorrow have a godly turn; let it work out a reformation of character; and come, accept pardon for the past and guidance for the future, from him whom you have crucified."

In Acts xvii. 30, repentance appears to refer to worship, as that forms the principal subject of Paul's discourse. But it will be observed that the last judgment immediately follows, and as it is then the secrets of men's hearts will be revealed, we are disposed to think Paul fashioned his words suddenly to suit this culminating truth; as God alone can tell whether a man is truly changed or not, and he would severely punish those whom he saw were wilfully withstanding truth. We may turn to this passage again when speaking of conversion. There are several passages where repentance and conversion are found together; these we will introduce then also.

In the 2nd of Romans Paul is charging the self-righteous Jew who obeyed the law with doing the same things as he said the Gentiles did. In the 4th verse he uses the word repentance to represent an opposite course of conduct.

In Rom. xi. 29, repentance is used, unhappily, for the other word previously mentioned, causing an absurdity, and suggesting, indeed, a most pernicious idea, viz.: that repentance is not necessary to procure the gifts and calling of God. The true idea is, God chose the children of Israel to be his people, and still loves the nation for their fathers' sake. God does not experience any regret or sorrow for having called them and bestowed gifts upon them; therefore the Gentiles must not think they are cut off from the full benefits of the gospel.

In 2nd Cor. xii. 21, a forcible example occurs of the apostolic use of the word. There it is not sorrow, but reformation, Paul aims at. Judas experienced a repentance deep and regretful, but Matt. xxvii. 3, shows us that it was not that which Paul required of the Corinthians which he manifested, but simply an intense regret and sorrow for his sin, unproductive of good, to express which, this other word is used.

Lastly: In the letters to the churches in the Revelation, the Spirit frequently uses the word repent, and it appears to me, always with reference to their moral condition. There is no charge made of their having neglected the ordinances. They were numerous, apparently flourishing, rich in this world's goods, but their virtue had suffered. Some were praised for adhering to the true apostles and detecting the false ones—others that they had withstood Judaizing influences—others that they had kept the faith. Indeed, there is no complaint made about the worship, as if it had been altered; but there is a great deal made against their morality, bringing them under the reproof of the Spirit, and requiring a repentance, though it might be they required not to be commanded to convert themselves, or be converted.

We might adduce other passages bearing out our idea, but these surely prove incontestably the comprehensive character of repentance, as used by the sacred writers, and that we can come to no other conclusion, than that he only has repented who has turned from his sin, and is trying to live virtuously before God.

THE HARVEST.

UNDER the dark shadow and in the arms of Winter, Nature took her rest, and the voice of the loud storm did not awake her from sleep. But when the time of the singing of birds came, she heard the first note, and responded to the song. The modest and beautiful flowers appeared, the face of nature was renewed, and the frown of Winter was exchanged for the smile of Spring. The cold North-wind was sent back to the dreary realm of desolation; while the increasingly warm rays of the sun clothed the valleys with beauty and adorned the hills with freshness and glory. The flowers bloomed, the days increased, the birds sang; the seed was sown, the green blade appeared, and all surrounding objects were clothed in a vesture of surpassing beauty — a rich vesture, interwoven throughout with the wisdom and perfections of God. Then came the Summer, not with its overpowering heat, not with its long sultry days: the earth was thirsty, and the rain fell, and while the clouds hung heavily, the crop waved in beauty, and in its abundance promised plenty to the children of men. It was pleasant to hear the voice, and to behold the loveliness of Spring; but all those things were connected with the future. It could not be always Spring. If the Spring-time were to continue only through one year, we should be tantalized with its beauties — it would mock us, and in the midst of its joys and songs, we should die for want of bread. We should have the beautiful blossom, but not the fruit — we should have the green blade of grass, but not the golden corn. The verdure would become gloom, and in the midst of the full exuberance of life, the cold hand of death would fall upon us, and we should be no more seen. Amidst all the melodies of Spring, I hear the voice of God. When the winds blow, I am reminded of God. As the varied and exquisite clouds pass over my head, I think of Him who "bowed the heavens and came down, and darkness was under his feet, and he rode upon a cherub, and did fly; yea, he did fly upon the wings of the wind." When I behold the sun coming forth in its strength, before whose light the darkness flies, and in whose light creation rejoices and all the works of the Lord shout for joy, I am led to think of Jesus, who is the Sun of Righteousness, whose rays disperse the darkness of the moral world, and cause the hearts of the saints to rejoice. And when in the heavens we behold, with its beautiful light and radiant benignity, the clear and loving star of the morning, our thoughts revert to Him who is the bright and morning star, whose light shines to illumine the spirit, and to guide it up into the realms of life. But the harvest has come — this head season of the year — this time of promise — this state of plenty. The hardy laborer grasps the sickle, for the corn is fully ripe. The God of the harvest has brought it to a state of preparation, and it will soon be gathered into the garner. We love to walk into the fields even when the white mantle of snow is upon them; but now how full of life and beauty they are! Let us go into the barley field. What a full and heavy crop! Precious grain. This barley reminds me of the past, and by the association of idea we refer to the ancient harvest in the early history of the world, when the sheaf was taken and waved before the Lord. Are we not sadly degenerate now? Throughout the patriarchal, prophetic, and apostolic periods, this good grain was used as food for man and beast; but now, to the shame of our country, a great portion of this boon is turned into a drink which is a curse to the world and a disgrace to the church. In the midst of this flowing golden corn of God, my spirit yearns with a deep desire that we should return to the plain practical wisdom of our forefathers, and no longer pervert the good blessings of a merciful Providence. Great God of the harvest! in thy dread name we feel that our deluded fellow-countrymen have violated Thy wise and just laws — that in this act of the misappropriation of Thy good creation, they have sown to the wind and reaped the whirlwind: and we pray Thee to hasten the time, when the pure light of Thy sacred teachings may lead them back to the paths of truth and of plenty from which they have so long strayed! And we love not the less to walk in the wheat fields, for this is in accordance with the promise, that our bread shall be given. This single ear of wheat fills my spirit with admiration and love. I know that none but the Eternal God could have made it. All the wonderful changes through which it has passed, were devised and planned in the Councils of Heaven—all its forms, from the first bursting of the seed in the ground, which it assumed before it attained perfection, were all sketched by the mind of God. He commanded the roots to descend and the blade to ascend—He commanded the wonderful influence of vitality to permeate every part—He commanded the rain to fall to moisten the earth, and to slake the thirst of this beautiful plant—He sent down the rays of light and heat in order that it might be brought to its present state of beauty and perfection—He preserved it in its tenderness, and ripened it in the strength of its fulness. God covered it with earth—God excited its vitality—God surrounded it with the elements necessary to its full development, and with the Psalmist we desire to praise Him for His wonderful works. And where is the heart which can withhold its grateful acknowledgments? What thousands of harvests have passed away, and yet there is an abundant supply. When the laborer thrusts in his sickle, it is preparatory to the corn being gathered in; but the time will come when the angel of the Lord shall thrust in his sickle, in order that all the inhabitants of the world may be gathered to judgment. Our harvest is the end of the Summer, the climax of plenty, and the hope of the Winter. But when the great day shall come, the harvest will be the end of the world, when all nations shall be gathered together—when humanity shall have completed its destiny—when all the transactions of men will have come to an end—when the mighty angel shall descend from heaven, for the purpose of swearing in the name of Him who liveth for ever, that time shall be no more. And we shall be there. That great day is of eternal moment to us. Then we shall be judged in righteousness. What a solemn thought! Every revolving year brings us nearer to the harvest, which is the end of the world. Here we love to walk amidst the rustling corn—we love to see the hard-working and honest laborers—we know some of them, and they are heirs of the kingdom: they can look forward with a good hope through grace—they can sing the songs of Zion in the harvest fields, and they are preparing for the solemnities of that great day. We love to see the gleaners come. We think of Boaz and Ruth. Be careful, ye children of the poor, to pick up every ear of corn; but while you are so careful to be the possessors of that which shall be turned into the bread which perishes, be so much the more careful, through faith and obedience, to obtain a rich supply of the bread of life—of the spiritual manna which comes down from heaven. Jesus loved the poor, and he will love you, if you serve him with all your hearts.

We should be thankful for the harvest. It encompasses us with mercies. The rich and the poor are alike dependent upon it. Our fields are the rich gardens of the Lord, and when our garners are full, we should never forget the great and merciful Giver. I have sat by the running stream in the sultry day—I have heard the hum of the bee and the rustling corn, and then in silence and alone have I thought of Him who with his disciples walked through the corn-field on the Sabbath. He was poor and despised, and his disciples were hungry, and they plucked the ears of corn. The Bible is our corn-field. God has sown the seed of eternal truth in the Word, and we can, without money and without price, pluck the precious ears of corn. We can eat, and our souls shall live. In it we not only find the seed of promise, but the rose of Sharon. Here are the types and the antitypes—here are the promises of life, and a feast of fat things for the believing soul—here mercy and truth, heaven and earth, and God and the sinner meet—pardon is wanted, and pardon is bestowed. Our last harvest time on earth must come, and we know not how soon. Let us resolve to work while it is day, remembering that the night cometh when no man can work. These fair fields of earth—these brooks and vales, these trees and flowers, these rising hills, and beautiful setting suns, and brilliant stars, will soon be looked upon for the last time. Holy Father! may our spirits be prepared for the change. Our Lord's day morning meetings to us may soon terminate. We may soon break the loaf for the last time. Death during the last year has entered amongst us, and some of our loved ones have been removed.

Some were like shocks of corn fully ripe, whom our Heavenly Father has gathered in. Others were like tender plants nipped in the bud, and appeared to be prematurely entombed. Their removal from us possesses the voice of warning. Though they are dead, they yet speak to us : they are gone but a little time before. May we meet in the world of bliss, where sin is not, where death has no power, where sorrow and sighing are done away, and where we shall realize the untold blessings of an "eternal weight of glory." J. L. London.

"CHRIST'S CHURCH IDENTIFIED."

ONE of the evil effects, or fruits of opinionism, is the stultifying of the human mind, so that it perceives not the difference — the palpable difference — that exists between faith and opinions. Perhaps, with a majority of the religionists of this generation, all faith is considered to be opinions, and all opinions faith ; so that their religious creeds are a heterogeneous conglomeration of both faith and opinions—things calculated to bewilder the mind, and to serve as points of concentration for those who are most effectually bewildered or captivated by them.

But there is nothing to our mind more certain, than that there is a radical difference between faith and opinions. And this difference is clearly pointed out—if not by opinion-smitten theologians—by our best lexicographers. For the present we shall adduce only the definitions of Crabbe and Webster.

And first, we shall hear the definition of Crabbe. "Opinion, in Latin opinio, from opino, to think or judge," &c. "Opinions are formed on speculative matter." "Opinions are more liable to error than sentiments." We give but a small part of Crabbe's article under this head—enough, however, to show that inasmuch as opinions are founded "on speculative matter," they are not founded on facts, but merely on speculative reasonings. Indeed, Crabbe makes to exist only a shade of difference between opinions and notions. And we trust that it is not necessary that we prove mere notions to be no part of the faith by which the Christian lives and overcomes the world.

Webster, who, in regard to definition, is thought to be our best lexicographer, defines opinion as follows : "The judgment which the mind forms of any proposition, statement, theory, or event, the truth or falsehood of which is supported by a degree of evidence that renders it probable, but does not produce absolute knowledge or certainty." Thus the reader will observe, that according to both Webster and Crabbe—and to these we might have added many more—opinions are "speculative" and "uncertain"—mere reasonings and deductions of the human mind on speculative principles. Hence, also, nearly this whole family of words convey an evil meaning ; for an opinionist is "one fond of his own notions, or unduly attached to his own opinions." To be opinioned, is "to be attached to particular opinions—conceited." Opinionativeness is "excessive attachment to one's own opinions—obstinacy in opinion." But can a person be too much attached to matters of faith ? Does not the Scriptures teach us to seek to obtain the perfecting of our faith ? And is this the perfecting of opinions, and the full assurance of opinions ? If so, then, the Scriptures exhort us to be mere opinionists, and to cherish opinionativeness as the grand, moral mainspring of our religion.

The difference between faith and opinions is this : faith is founded on testimony ; opinions, as we have seen, on speculative matters. For example : I believe that there once existed a man whose name was Augustus Cæsar ; and it is my opinion that he was excited by no evil motive to decree that all the world should be taxed. To the fact, that Cæsar Augustus once existed, I have unequivocal testimony. If the testimony be true—and I can detect no flaw in it—this eminent personage did certainly once exist : I, therefore, believe it. But, as to what his motive was in decreeing this tax, I can only reason or infer ; I, therefore, cannot ascend above mere opinion in relation to his motives. I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God—that he died upon the cross—that he was buried—arose the third day—ascended to heaven, &c. For all these facts we have the testimony of credible witnesses. I, therefore, believe them. It is my opinion, that inasmuch as flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, the body of Jesus was changed from a natural to a spiritual body within the time of his ascension to heaven. I have no conclusive proof of the fact—my conclusion is the result merely of reasoning from one fact to another; and may be either true or false; it is, therefore, opinion. I believe that Jesus will come a second time without a sin-offering unto salvation. But, if I fix the time of his coming—if that time is not revealed in the Bible—I am again in the latitude of opinions; and if I become wedded to any unrevealed notion or opinion concerning the time of Christ's second coming, I am an opinionist; and, may, very easily, by preaching my opinion, become a schismatic; perhaps, a factionist; at all events, I shall be in great danger of becoming a fanatic!

Illustrations, by which the difference between faith and opinion may be exhibited, might be multiplied indefinitely. For the present, these may suffice. A little attention to the Scriptures will fully demonstrate that the Christian religion is a religion of faith, or of facts and testimonies. "That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled of the word of life (for the life was manifested, and we have seen it, and bear witness, and show unto you that eternal life which was with the Father and was manifest unto you); that which we have seen and heard we declare unto you, that ye may have fellowship with us; and truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with the Son Jesus Christ" (1 John i. 1-3.) Things seen, heard or handled, by the apostolic witnesses, comprised the whole of the materials, which the Spirit of God admitted into the fabric of Christianity; or, to change the figure, constituted the whole capital of the Christian copartnery or fellowship. There was not a human opinion in this spiritual capital; and, consequently, there was no primitive Christian fellowship on account of opinions. Opinions were private property. The spiritual Christian merchants traded not in these in order to become rich towards God; but on the facts and testimonies of the Gospel. These were able to make them wise unto salvation. Through these they had fellowship with the Apostles, were called unto the fellowship of Jesus Christ, and enjoyed fellowship one with another. These constituted the light in which they walked, and concerning which it is said, "But, if we walk in the light, as He is in the light, we have fellowship with one another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin."

We do feel most intensely desirous to impress upon the mind of the reader, not only the distinction that exists between faith and opinion, but the importance of this distinction. Without this distinction, and unless professors of Christianity will appreciate it and act upon it, Christian union or fellowship upon Christian principles can never be enjoyed. Evidence of this fact, as strong as Holy Writ, and as haggard and unclean as the ghosts of sectarianism, stare us in the face from every corner. Where now is the universal Christian fellowship that existed in the hale and undegenerate days of Christianity? It has, for the most part, departed from our earth; or it has degenerated into party, sectional, fractional, factional, fellowships; and instead of the giant spirit that animated the primitive church, and made it strong in the Lord and in the power of his might, a thousand dwarfish spirits have descended or ascended to our earth—the spirits of religious factions—spirits in a great measure hostile to one another, and to God; and instead of keeping the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace—instead of loving one another with pure hearts fervently—the thousand and one religious factions, each animated by its own appropriate spirit, have been set together by the ears—have been stimulated to bite and devour one another: so that Christendom has been filled with "contention and strife:" and as the Scripture says, "confusion and every evil work." And, until we return to the primitive spiritual copartnery, this sad work will still go on. The same causes will continue to produce the same effects. We, therefore, call upon every philanthropist—upon every good man to put his shoulder to the wheel—to aid in removing the causes of disunion, to repudiate all fellowships founded on opinions, and to return to the apostolic matter of fact fellowship. Reader, God requires this at your hands!

True, however, and scriptural, and obvious as is this whole case, we are not sanguine enough to hope to influence beneficially the thorough sectarian. As well might we attempt to convince the Romanist of the futility of the doctrine of transubstantiation. Men are prone to become inordinately attached to human peculiarities in religion. The whole history of our race, from the beginning, is demonstration of this fact: and when so attached, there is but little hope that argument will sever the chains by which they have been bound. Indeed, argument but irritates the man who is deeply imbued with sectarian spirit. He thinks of his darling peculiarities, and feels as if an enemy were about to take away his gods. Hence the Christian plea for union has become the subject of bitter hate, and of biting sarcasm and ridicule. There has been so much religious jockeyism among the other isms of this treacherous world, that many, who otherwise might be benefitted by the Christian plea, are on the alert, lest they should get their necks in a snare, or be caught in a painted trap. And the captains of beligerent fifties, and hundreds, and thousands, sneer at every effort to carry into effect the prayer of the Saviour—the blood-sealed prayer. It has, indeed, become scandalous to plead for the order of the things under which the prayer of Zion's King can be answered. Many of the clergy persuade the people that religious divisions are upon the whole salutary: which is but to persuade them that the prayer of the Saviour ought not to be answered. But, after all, we thank God and take courage —for there are many, both in and out of the churches, who will hear and appreciate our plea. The glorious work is going on; and will go on. No earthly power can stop it. The stately stepplings of religious reformation in its onward march to glory, may be interrupted, but stopped it cannot be. Like the glorious Sun in the heavens, it is careering onward in its destined course to glorify God and bless mankind with its balmy splendours—and shall endure when the great Sun shall be blotted out—and when sectarianism, like a baleful star, stricken from its orbit, shall be left to fall into loneliness and night.

Brethren, let us entreat you to shun, as you would shun perdition, the thorny paths of opinionism. We do not mean that you shall not have opinions, but we entreat you not to make any one, or all of them, tests of Christian fellowship. And be strongly guarded against cherishing such opinions as conflict with the facts and truths of Christianity. Determine, with Paul, to know nothing but Jesus Christ and him crucified. "Hold fast the FORM of sound words: in faith and love which is in Jesus Christ" (2 Tim. iv. 13.) And do not forget to "refuse profane and old wives' fables, and to exercise yourselves unto godliness" (1 Tim. iv. 7.) And remember, that "if any man teach otherwise, and consent not to wholesome words, even the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to the doctrine which is according to godliness, he is proud, knowing nothing, but doting about questions, and strifes of words, whereof cometh envy, strife, railings, evil surmising, perverse disputings of men of corrupt minds, and destitute of the truth, supposing that gain is godliness: from such withdraw thyself" (1 Tim. vi. 3-5.)

LIVE IN PEACE.

"Now I beseech you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye all speak the same thing, and that there be no divisions among you; but that ye be perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment" (1 Cor. i. 10.)

"Finally, brethren, farewell. Be perfect, be of good comfort, be of one mind, live in peace; and the God of love and peace shall be with you" (2 Cor. xiii. 11.)

In reflecting upon the above passages, I have been greatly struck by the vast importance which they attach to the Christian living in peace and love, in the unity of the faith, and in steadfastly observing all the ordinances of the Lord blameless. They show us plainly that we are not to set ourselves up as judges one of another, but to love the brotherhood—to bear one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ. We cannot be of one mind and live in peace if evil or unkind thoughts are fostered and cherished in our hearts—"in malice be ye children." The same things were taught in every church; therefore, it behoves every one who enters the church in Christ's own appointed manner, to build it up, both by precept and example, in every possible way within his power. And if he see error (and where shall we find a perfect church on earth?) or do not meet with all he wishes in those with whom he unites, is he to withdraw from the church, and enrol himself as a member of another church, which is not certainly the church of Christ, seeing the primary injunctions of the Lord and his Apostles to every church, and the very first step to obedience, are disregarded? I trow not. Is he to flee like a coward in battle from the face of his enemy? Is he not rather to stand up, like a brave soldier of the cross, and defend the cause of his Great Master? And if he possess more light than one whom he considers an erring brother, ought he not to strive to put the evil from the midst of the brethren, and so prove his own faithfulness to the church, and show by a holy life and conversation how a disciple of the meek and lowly Jesus ought to live? Thus would his life be a daily reproach to all those who witnessed it, and still persisted in sin. We must bear with one another, or there can be no hope of peace and unity in the church. How long has our kind Heavenly Father borne with us? Did he not know our frame, and mercifully remember that we are dust, surely we should not now be living monuments of his mysterious love. Let us dwell upon what Christ has done for us, what he has suffered that we might live eternally, in order that we may be more lenient towards those who have less strength and faith than ourselves; that we may, by our zeal and love, win sinners for Christ, and so hasten on the great harvest of souls. Peter says, "Be ye all of one mind, having compassion one to another; love as brethren, be pitiful, be courteous." Paul says to the Philippians, "Fulfil ye my joy, that ye be like-minded, having the same love, being of one accord, of one mind"—"in lowliness of mind let each esteem others better than themselves." This speaks plainly enough that there would be need for forbearance, and therefore we must not expect that our virtues are to be dormant, but in continual exercise. We must not be weary in well-doing, for it is promised us that we shall reap if we faint not. Let us ever bear in mind that the greater the conflict, the greater, the nobler the victory. It must not be counted a small privilege to be allowed, nay, even to be commanded, to fight the battle of our Redeemer; he has promised to stand by us, to give us strength for every trial, and he offers a crown of life to every victor. If we remain faithful to the end, it is written, we shall come off more than conquerors through him that loved us, and shed his own precious blood for us. God commendeth his love towards us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us. He did not shrink from sufferings the most appalling; and shall we not then strive to cultivate a spirit of love towards all, especially towards those who are of the household of faith? Shall we not, in spite of error, or disagreeableness of any kind, remain in the church to strengthen it, and, if possible, to build up those who are ready to fall? Let us cultivate a spirit of meekness, for the apostle considered it necessary to exhort those who thought they stood, to take heed lest they fall: for we stand not in our own strength, otherwise our fall would be inevitable.

It appears to me an awful thing for one who has once been enlightened so as to put on Christ by baptism, to leave the church because there are errors in it, and take upon him another name beside that of our only Head and Master (that being the natural consequence of uniting with a sect.) Paul severely censured the Corinthians for taking, some the name of Paul, some that of Apollos, and some of Christ. The questions naturally followed—Is Christ divided? Was Paul crucified for you? Were ye baptized in the name of Paul? Similar questions are fearfully applicable in our day. No, my dear brethren, there are to be no divisions among us, but we are to be perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment.

"When the Son of Man cometh will he find faith on the earth." These words of our dear Redeemer are full of import ; he knew the end from the beginning ; he knew that his church would be torn by strife, discord, and schism : but he will know his own from amongst the tares ; and he who is faithful to the end will have cause to rejoice through all eternity, that he kept himself steadfast in the truth. In the latter times some will depart from the faith. We must truly be living in the latter times now, for we have around us daily proofs of backsliding. Any one leaving the church, however plausible the reason he may imagine he has, will find that he has taken the first step in a downward course, the end of which we cannot tell. May God, of his great mercy, preserve us from the first step in sin, and give us grace to withstand the machinations of our threefold enemy—the world, the flesh, and the devil. May He perfect his strength in our weakness, and bring us safely through this wilderness of sin, for his dear Son's sake, our only hope, our Redeemer, our all.—A

HUMAN CREEDS.

THE age for human creeds, as bonds of church fellowship and communion, is, we think, gradually but permanently declining. The current of educated mind is cutting for itself a new channel, and leaving human authority in matters of religion a dry and barren sand-beach, unoccupied and deserted. Men are beginning to approach the Holy Scriptures with the freedom and calmness of deliberate insight into their teachings ; and as a necessary consequence they are beginning to see the truth in its celestial form. They are being struck with the intelligibility of the Bible. They are finding that the Scriptures are admirably adapted to the common mind—that they are emphatically the book for humanity—and that, when left free and untrammelled by human interference, it will cut its way to the human heart with unerring certainty, and leave there its own heavenly truth and spirit of love.

The absurd guardianship of priests over the Word of God is becoming more and more apparent in the increasing intelligence of the people ; and the conviction that the Bible is able to take care of itself, is daily deepening in the public mind. The authority of ecclesiasticism—supreme in the middle ages—is waning and giving place to the simple authority of divine truth, which is felt to be, not a monopoly of a few church officials, but the rightful inheritance and joyful property of all men. As the human mind advances, the common right of freedom of thought and conscience becomes clearer and more precious. That mind was made for perpetual growth, is now a truth shining by its own light ; and that there is no human authority which can lawfully set limits to the search for truth, is felt in all the strength of self-evident certainty.

The transition from spiritual tyranny to the glorious liberty of truth must, of necessity, be a slow and tedious process. The supreme dominion of the Roman Catholic Church left upon the eyes of all Protestants a film which obscured and distorted their vision. The idea that the faith of the church must be cunningly extracted from the Scriptures by priests and professed theologians, and put up into a systematic confession of faith, to be held as a bond of connection among the children of God, is a duplicate of the dogma that the Pope, and Cardinals, and Bishops, in council assembled, have the right to dictate and command the religious faith and practice of all men.

The Pope claims infallibility, as the successor of Peter and the vice-gerent of God, to publish, or cause to be published, what men must believe in order to salvation. Protestants deny this claim on the part of his Holiness, but, with the confession of fallibility on their lips, proceed to do the same thing in substance, by manufacturing a fallible creed, and then elevating it to infallibility, by constituting it a test of faith and religious communion.

There never was so much absurdity contained in a single act as in making a poor, imperfect product of uninspired minds an absolute test or standard of religious truth. Human creeds are fallible, and no one dares to claim perfection for them. The authors do not pretend to claim for them that they are infallible exponents of the Bible. Why.

then, make them tests of truth? Can the fallible be, in any sense, a standard for the infallible? Surely not. But in making a fallible human creed a test of truth, of Bible truth, is not the inspired Word of God rejected and made subordinate to the uninspired dictum of erring man? The creed is an espionage set over the Bible, forcing it to speak only in the language assigned to it in the creed, and compelling the members of the party adopting it, to interpret the Word of God by the teachings of fallible men. Any departure from the creed is an offence to be punished by the judges; and if persisted in, must be punished with excommunication. If this is not dethroning the Word of God, then is not the Word of God not dethroned by Popery in any instance whatever.

It may be said, no one is compelled to subscribe the creed unless he choose to do it: if a man do not like a particular creed, let him go somewhere else. Yes, but he is sent from one human instrument of this sort to another; and go where he will among the sects, he still meets the creed; for the creed is the organic law of every sect—its primal law of development. He is only permitted to choose his master, that is, the creed; and a bondman he must be to some human confession, unless he has the courage to renounce all teachers or masters but Christ. If he do this—if he bind the living and eternally abiding Word of God to his heart, and refuse to any set of uninspired men the right to furnish to him his faith ready-made in the work-shop of some synod, then he will be named “heretic,” and must bear through life the censure and reproach which large bodies and thoroughly drilled corps of sectarians are able to fasten on him. For what? Simply for using the liberty which the sects at first granted, to choose his own creed. But he chose the Bible as his creed! Alas! this is an unpardonable offence to sectarians—the very essence and spirit of damnable heresy.

There is another point in this liberty of creed-making and creed-choosing which we wish to set before the reader. Each party claims the right to manufacture its creed. There is a bold and lawless assumption underlying this specious show of liberty. It is assumed as the basis of this liberty, that men have the right to sever or divide the family of God, and to re-construct the church on the basis of sectarianism. There can be no liberty to make or to choose among different and conflicting creeds, except upon the assumption that the family of God may be scripturally divided into parties, each rallying around its chosen human confession of faith.

Now we do most solemnly and emphatically deny this assumption from its beginning to its end. Schism and partyism among the people of God are as positively denounced in the Scriptures as witchcraft and atheism. The church is a unit in the inspired writings. No “schism” is tolerated by the Holy Spirit. The body of Christ, which is the church, is one body. He who severs and divides it, strikes a dreadful blow at the cause of Christ and humanity. No more effectual course of assault upon the kingdom of God can be made than to divide it into jarring and hostile factions. Indeed this is the only way by which any permanent injury can be done the church. The Saviour has settled this point by enunciating a universal truth, which is applicable to every cause and social state: it is this, “A kingdom divided against himself cannot stand.” And we are warranted, we think, in the assertion, that perpetual divisions in the church of God, would result in the utter extinction of Christianity.

The Son of God has made the conversion of the world to depend on the unity or oneness of his church. “Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also which shall believe on me through their word; that they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us: that the world may believe that thou hast sent me” (John xvii. 20, 21.) To rise up against, or to seek by artifice clothed with the blandishment of interpretation, to modify this teaching of Christ, so as to make it admit, in any sense, the existence of denominational distinctions in the church, is simply monstrous impiety and folly. The art of making the worse appear the better reason, springs from infernal, and not from celestial, inspiration.

nating Spirit that asserts the unity of God, asserts the unity of the church. "There is one body" (Eph. iv. 4-6.) Such is the oracle. We stand aghast at polytheism, because it is utterly false. But how many embrace and publicly advocate a multiplicity of churches—and yet the last is just as false as the first. There is but one God, and but one church. Whoever makes a second God or a second church, creates a palpable falsehood, from which nothing but bitterness and death can issue. Polytheism is a lie in its root—and so is sectarianism!

The unity of the church, as before remarked and quoted, is the condition of the conversion of the world. The Saviour simply affirms this unity to be essential to this grand consummation. This closes all debate on the point. The liberty, therefore, which is claimed to make a human creed a test of faith and communion, or to choose one as the standard of revealed truth, is the liberty to destroy the very purpose for which the Lord of glory died and rose again. No such right is vested in any man, or set of men. There is a moral necessity against it. It is daring revolt against the KING of kings—who is the Head of all principality and power.

The necessity of human creeds is argued thus:—That the faith of the church may be uniform, and that all men may know what it is. On this we remark: 1st, That creeds do not secure this end; but become the very sources of discord and strife. This is proved by the divisions and subdivisions of different denominations which have human creeds, into adverse parties. Has the creed prevented the Methodist church from some half-dozen divisions? Has it prevented the Presbyterians from the same sad fate? By no means. Sectarians talk as if their party creeds were the very pavilions of religious peace! The very reverse is the truth. These creeds were born of brawls and feuds. The history of creeds shows that uniformity of faith and practice is beyond the power of summaries of sound doctrines. Dr. Hodge, of Princeton, says that the Presbyterian church could not hold together for a single week, if all the propositions of the Westminster Confession were made a condition of ministerial fellowship. The same is true of the Church of England. But, in the second place, is the Bible incapable of securing a uniform faith in the church? This is implied in the argument for creeds. Now, we hold that the Bible, indicted by the Spirit of all wisdom, the Spirit of God, is exactly adapted to point out the Christian faith. We contend that it does reveal, in most simple, perspicuous language, every item of faith necessary to the salvation of the soul. No uninspired writer can arrange and enunciate the faith of the gospel so clearly and plainly as the Scriptures. The argument, therefore, for human creeds, falls to the ground.

As to that other saying so common among persons who do not think for themselves, but who have certain clerical factors to do this irksome business for them, to wit: That a creed is necessary in order for the people to know what the faith of the church is—it is unworthy of a serious refutation. Does the Bible declare nothing? Does it settle nothing? Does it announce nothing for men to believe? Are the Holy Scriptures a muddy pond in which clerical gentlemen may amuse themselves at angling? It is true, that among sectarians their creed is necessary to acquaint the world with their peculiar tenets of doctrine; because the Bible knows nothing about their speculative theology. But the Bible declares the true doctrine of Christ, and consequently, does most exactly set forth in divine language, unequalled for its simplicity, the faith of the true church of God. It requires a human creed to set forth the peculiar doctrines of a human society; but the Bible is alone able to declare the doctrine of Christ and the Apostles. The ancient church had no human creed to define and announce its faith to the world. The Sacred Writings were amply sufficient for this purpose then. They were amply sufficient to secure the unity of the body of Christ. The true church no more stands in need of a human confession now than it did then.

The moment the Bible and its purpose are truly apprehended and appreciated, the love and reverence of human creeds fade from the heart, like wreaths of morning mists. The Word of God is given to make a man wise unto salvation, and to qualify him perfectly for every good work. The Holy Scriptures are alone able to do this, and nothing beyond it is either possible or desirable in religion.

The chief evil of making a human creed a bond of fellowship, after the first great evil of division, is, that it comes in between the mind and the Word of God, and separates the heart from the immediate truth of heaven. To whom is a man to go for his religious faith and knowledge? There can be but one response: "Lord, thou hast the words of eternal life." Ought not a man to approach the Word of God alone to learn the truth? Should there be placed between him and that Word an imperfect human medium? The deep voice of the heart answers, No. But a human creed is an imperfect medium placed between the mind and the Word of God. The creed is an authoritative interpreter of the Bible. This is its office and end. The Bible speaks only through the creed. No one having adopted a human confession of faith can interpret the Scriptures contrary to it, but at the peril of his standing and peace in his church. He is completely subjected to his creed. He must believe by it, live by it, read by it, pray by it, and if he be a preacher, he must punctiliously preach by it. His whole intellectual and moral being is merged and lost in the creed. Now in the face of an authoritative divine revelation, we do profoundly feel that all this is monstrous folly and wholly wrong.

If the Lord were here in person, teaching us the plan of salvation, who would think that a synod, or conference of uninspired clergymen, ought to sit in judgment on his doctrine, and make their opinions of it the authoritative faith of a party of believers? Under such circumstances, the interposition of a human creed would be regarded as almost, if not quite, the sin of blasphemy. It would be an absolute rejection of his authority. This is precisely the sin of creed-making and creed-using. It amounts to a rejection of Christ. It degrades the awful authority of the Word of God, and makes it to occupy the place of a subordinate in the church. For although Christ is not here in person, his Word is here, and ought to be as authoritative to us as though we were hearing the same from the lips of the Saviour in articulate speech.

The Bible, and the Bible alone, is the only divine creed of the true church. Let us put a generous confidence in it, as being the wisdom of the Infinite Mind, the Father of our spirits. It is the only test and standard of religious truth, and the only bond of ecclesiastical unity, union, and co-operation among the people of God. Upon this Holy Volume all Christians can, and finally will, unite into one body, under one Lord and King. The tendency of society is to this point, and for this end we ought to labour and pray without ceasing.

STUDY OF THE BIBLE

To facilitate the study of the Book, I would suggest the following division: First, memorize the Antediluvian Scriptures from the first chapter of Genesis to the sixth inclusive, comprehending a period of 1656 years from the creation to the flood. Secondly, study the Patriarchal Scriptures from Genesis, tenth chapter, to the end of the book of Genesis. Thirdly, study the Mosaical Scriptures from the commencement of the exode to the end of the second law—Deuteronomy. Fourthly, study the Historical Scriptures from the first of Joshua to the end of Esther. Fifthly, study the Prophetical Scriptures from the first of Isaiah to the end of Malachi. Sixthly, study the Poetical Scriptures, embracing Job and the Psalms. Seventhly, study the Proverbial Scriptures, the books of Proverbs and Ecclesiastes. The Jewish doctors and our Saviour recognized another division, the Law, the Prophets, and the Psalms—Luke 24. The New Testament may be divided into the historical books—which are five; the epistolary and the prophetical, or Apocalupsis (Greek)—a Revelation which God gave to his Son Jesus Christ to show to his servants (i. 1.) The label in our Bibles of that book is false, which says, the Revelation of St. John the Divine. It was not given to John as a man, nor as a divine; but to Jesus Christ.

Just so long as a preacher reads and preaches the Scriptures, abounds in prayer, and is clothed with humility, he will be useful, and no longer. The Scriptures are the foundation of all the divinity, theology, and orthodoxy in the world. All the rest is tradition, speculation, sectarianism, and nonsense. All preachers ought to memorize the whole Bible; and as many private members as can. Let the Word of God dwell in you richly. Many persons in ancient and modern times memorized the whole Bible before novels were invented. Apollos was eloquent and powerful in the Scriptures. The Scriptures have converted every man and woman that ever was converted to Jesus Christ since his ascension to this day—Calvinism and sectarianism to the contrary notwithstanding. The Word of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul (Psalm 19.) Our people are just beginning to pull the scabbard off the sword of the Spirit, and to raise the Bible from under the rubbish which has lain on it. Read and revere the sacred page—

A page which not the conflagration can destroy.

The Bible is a copy of God's decrees—

REFORMATION OF SECTS.

Who that reads and studies the inspired volume thinks of the Reformation of Sects as a whole? We regard it impossible. Hence, we do not hope for it. But there are men within sectary lines and surroundings who are not sect-men. The call to them is, "Come ye out of Babylon" (Rev. xviii. 4.)

Relative to the destruction of sects, this is as certain as the certainty of God's promise. The great Babel city, with its extended suburbs, embracing every sect, under whatever name, must be hurled from the earth as a millstone is dashed with violence into the sea. When or how this shall take place, is not of such consequence as to be assured that God has said it, and that His word must stand.

Until the sect called Babylon the Great arose, the Jewish nation at the time of the Lord's crucifixion was the strongest and most stubborn sect that ever appeared among men. How did God treat this great sect? The gospel was preached to the people for full thirty-five years, and when every man who readily received it was saved, the successors of the great Caesars demolished the haughty city, and either slew or dispersed the whole race of sect-men.

Gentiles, as well as faithful Jews, have since been entrusted with the oracles of the better covenant; and to us it seems more than simply possible, without entering deeply into the prophetic writings, that the Mistress of the Sects, and all her sects, small and great, will be treated after the same manner, which will, to our vision, be true benevolence, taking a wide view of things.

Meantime, with all the fervency of a message originating in heaven, our work is to be engaged in heralding the gospel of the Redeemer, never halting to conclude either philosophically or ecclesiastically, whether all the world will be converted, or whether one in a million will be saved. Our business is to separate heavenly realities from earthly corruptions, pressing the truth in the love of it upon men, and not attempt to estimate how many will receive or reject the Lord Jesus. When all the teachable men are called out of any sect into the Lord's glory and liberty, there is good reason to conclude that the sect will speedily be destroyed; but how is of slight moment to any man who believes in and works under the true Lord. D. O.

"A LOST POWER."

A ZEALOUS Methodist writer, under the above head, makes the following important observations:—"The apostles, so far as we know, held no prayer-meetings to pray for the conversion of souls after preaching. Faith came by hearing, and while hearing they repented, believed, and were saved. This was the way of salvation then. It is God's way. The error of unbelief in modern times has perverted God's original order—preaching is only expected now at the most to produce conviction; the conversion is looked for from the prayer-meeting. God is very merciful; but are we not at fault? 'According to our faith, so it is done to us.' We do not expect, pray for, or believe that sinners will be converted by or during the preaching—and they are not! Is not the fact itself a proof of the misdirected faith of the church?"

OPEN COUNCIL.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN G. Y. TICKLE AND A. CAMPBELL.

Copy of a Resolution adopted by the Annual Meeting of Christian Disciples held in Birmingham on the 9th, 10th, and 11th August, 1859.

"Reports having been circulated in this country that some of the churches of the Disciples in America admit unbaptized persons to the Lord's Table; it is requested that inquiry be made to ascertain the truth of the matter by the Chairman of this meeting to Bro. A. Campbell, and that the reply be published in the 'British Millennial Harbinger.'"

Liverpool, 1st Sept. 1859.

Dearly-beloved Brother Campbell,—The above resolution, you will observe, charges me, as chairman of the meeting, with the duty of bringing it under your notice. I hope you will kindly allow me to say, that I do no more than follow the promptings of my own "fervent mind towards you," when, as faithfully representing the spirit and tone of the meeting, I address you, on the subject of which the resolution treats, in the most respectful and affectionate manner.

The facts, as far as the churches in this country are concerned, are these. They conceive they have maintained a strict adherence to apostolic practice, in excluding all unbaptized persons, knowing them to be such, from the Lord's table. They regard any deviation from the terms of the "great commission," as involving a denial of the authority of the Lord Jesus on the very threshold of His kingdom. They view it, moreover, as an ignoble abandonment of the ground, to maintain which so many eager battles have been waged by yourself and other champions of the Reformation; and, upon which it has been so repeatedly affirmed, the union of all Christians is alone practicable, viz. "The supreme authority of the one Lord."

Every day and every hour makes the duty more apparent, on the part of those actively engaged in proclaiming the gospel in this country, of grasping with increased energy and firmness, the glorious standard thus inscribed as the rallying-point of a scattered, confused, and bleeding church. And, need I say, it has been somewhat a source of weakness for them to be pointed across the water, over and over again, to the lowering of the standard there—there, in the van of our noble army—that army upon whose faithfulness, beyond all question, the destiny of the world, as respects light and liberty for ages to come, seems to depend. Most of us believe it is a false alarm; and we wish not only to strengthen the hands of our evangelists by a true report, but to remove, as far as statement of facts shall enable us, the stigma cast upon our American brethren. To none could the brethren appeal with so much propriety as to yourself. They know that the history of the Reformation is mapped out before you as a succession of events, in every one of which you have borne a leading part. They know that to maintain unsullied the honor of the Christian name, as associated with the progress of that history, you would not account your own life dear to yourself. And they know also, that any statement you may have to make on the subject now submitted, will be received by themselves with unquestioning confidence, and by all interested as definitely settling the matter at rest. On these grounds, yet chiefly as it refers to evangelic labor in this country, it is my duty to urge the resolution upon your kind and courteous attention, and to solicit for it that amount of consideration which its importance demands.

On behalf of the churches in Great Britain and Ireland, I wait the favor of a reply, and remain, dear and honored brother, yours in the glorious hope of immortality, GILBERT Y. TICKLE.

BETHANY, Va. June, 1860.

Brother Gilbert Y. Tickle—My dear Sir—To-day, for the first time, your letter of Sept. 1st, 1859, came into my hand. It was accidentally found on file with other documents received during my absence from home, and by some means had escaped my notice. I can say, so far as my knowledge extends, we have no such custom. In all my travels abroad, I have not witnessed such an occurrence. That unbaptized persons may have sat down to the Lord's table amongst our brotherhood without invitation, is not wholly improbable; but I know of no church that has formally invited them to participate with it on such occasions.

We do not, indeed, on any such occasions, known to me, "invite" or "debar," in the usual currency of these words, any one unbaptized to participate with us in any act of social worship. Communion, indeed, is not confined to any one ordinance;—Lord's day, Lord's supper, prayer, or praise. We can preach to all men, and pray for all men, whether they pray or do not with us, but we cannot praise or commune for all men in any act of social worship. Such have been my convictions, time out of mind. All men have not faith, nor repentance, nor devotion of heart; and, therefore, all such are evidently of the world and not of the church, nor within the pale of Christian communion.

We are commanded "to offer up supplications, prayers, intercessions, and thanksgivings for all men—for kings and all who are in authority"—or "in eminent places," that we may lead a quiet and peaceful life in all godliness and honesty. For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour, "who would have all men to be saved and to come to the knowledge," or to the acknowledgment "of the truth." But this is very far from communing with all men in the social and positive ordinances of Christ's own kingdom. Evangelically we cannot, indeed, transcend the spirit or the letter of our Lord's intercessory prayer, reported John 17th chapter. This differs from that usually called "The Lord's prayer," in which the mediatorship of the Lord Jesus Christ is not at all recognized. His kingdom was then in the future tense. It had not come. Yet this prominent and suggestive fact neither your Church of England, nor your Church of Scotland, seems even yet to have appreciated.

That prayer was presented under the Jewish institution, and not under the Christian, as its first petition clearly indicates. But our Saviour's own intercessory prayer was for the twelve ambassadors, and for all those that should believe on him through their testimony, and place themselves under his reign of grace.

In our extended and annually extending community these, I may say, are regarded as stereotyped, self-evident facts; and, therefore, no longer debatable. We know not a dissenting voice in all the myriads of our brotherhood in this New World.

The kingship of Jesus the Christ is not publicly nor practically recognized in either your Church of England or your Church of Scotland. Your ecclesiastical bodies and your courts of judicature still confess their faith in a theocracy, and seem practically to repudiate a Christocracy. They do not, either in their civil or ecclesiastical courts, recognize the Kingship of the Lord Messiah. They do not conceive of him, and therefore do not honor him, as placed on the throne of God. They do not swear by him as Lord of all. Did he not teach that "he who sweareth by heaven, sweareth by the throne of God, and by him who sits upon it?" And does not Jesus the Christ sit upon the throne of God? Is he not constituted Lord of heaven and earth? And, therefore, "by him shall men swear." Did not Peter, in his opening speech, proclaim before a world's convention, "that God had constituted that same Jesus whom they crucified both Lord and Christ?" Did he not gloriously exalt him to the throne of the universe? Did he not proclaim that "to him every knee shall bow and every tongue confess?" And did not the Lord Jesus himself say, "He that sweareth by the throne of God, sweareth by him who sits upon it?" And was it not announced on the first Pentecost after his ascension, that God had highly exalted him, and constituted him both Lord and Christ? "He is Lord both of the dead and of the living"—and hence "we shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ," and he will pronounce the irrevocable sentences—"Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you" before the foundation of the universe; and, "Depart ye cursed into the eternal fire, prepared for the devil and his angels."

Manifest then it is that we shall be judged not by God the Father, as the Church of England, the Church of Rome, and sundry other sects teach and affirm.

The Lord Jesus Christ is ordained by the Father of the whole family in heaven and on earth, to be the Judge—the Final Judge of the living and the dead. He is our peer, and God the Father's peer; and therefore, because of this peerage, he is ordained to be the Judge of the living and of the dead. After the first judgment—that is, the judgment and acquittal of the righteous—these, too, will sit with him as associate judges, as assessors. Hence, says Paul, "Know ye not that we shall judge angels?" "Do you not know that the saints will judge the world?" (1 Cor. vi. 2.)

There is a fearful ignorance even in a large portion of even Protestantism, of the kingdom and jurisdiction of the Lord Jesus Christ. Socinianism, Arianism, and even Calvinism and Arminianism, are one and all "philosophies falsely so called." No one of us can appreciate the height and depth, the length and the breadth, of the fearful apostasy from the primitive church of the Lord Jesus Christ. Meantime I am constrained to lay down my pen, but in hope of resuming it at a more fitting season.

REVIEWS, NOTES ON PASSING EVENTS, CORRESPONDENCE, &amp;c.

BORN OF THE SPIRIT."

OUR notice last month of the "Messiahship, or Great Demonstration," by Walter Scott, contained an intimation that this number would place in the reader's possession an admirable criticism upon John iii. 8, from the pen of Moses E. Lard, which is alluded to and rejected by W. Scott. We give it entire, and without comment, feeling confident that commendation is uncalled for.

"We propose submitting, as we proceed, first, a translation of each single word, which, in the Common Version, is rendered 'wind.' This word occurs in the Greek New Testament three hundred and eighty-six times. In three hundred and eighty-four of these it is rendered into English either by the term 'spirit,' or by its inelegant equivalent 'ghost.' Once, in the Book of Revelation, it is rendered 'life,' where, with equal propriety and more consistency, it might have been rendered 'a spirit.' But not in a single case in the New Testament, except in the verse in hand, is it rendered 'wind.' Now, in translating, one great rule to be observed is this—to translate the same original word uniformly by the same equivalent English word, unless the sense forbids it. No translation is deemed good which violates this rule, none very faulty which does not. Now, since the word in hand, out of three hundred and eighty-six instances, is, in three hundred and eighty-four of them, uniformly rendered into English either by the term 'spirit,' or by a term having precisely the same meaning, the presumption in favour of a similar rendering in the two remaining instances is as three hundred and eighty-four to two. And when it is remembered that the sense interposes no obstacle to such a rendering, this presumption becomes an imperious necessity. For these reasons, therefore, we do not hesitate to render the word in hand 'spirit,' meaning, thereby, the Holy Spirit.

Should the case be thought to require it, we may add, that this rendering has been suggested, if it is not still sanctioned, by names which stand justly high in learning and sacred criticism. Its claims, however, upon public confidence, must rest ultimately on its own merits.

Next, respecting the word translated 'bloweth.' This word is found in the Greek New Testament but seven times; in six of which it is used to express the acts of things, and only in the remaining instance (the present) the act of a person. But, in almost every case where expressive of the act of a person, is to be rendered into English simply by the word 'breathe.' And this is so obviously the word by which it is to be rendered, in the present instance, that we shall attempt no defence of the rendering.

But in what acceptation are we to take the word 'breathe'?—a literal or a figurative? To answer this question at once, we inquire, Does that essential, subtle person, whom we denominate the Spirit, perform the act we call breathing? Can we predicate of it such an act in any intelligible sense—especially in the sense in which we say of a man, he breathes? Certainly not. To do so would be to assert what we believe the very nature of the case forbids; for it does not consist with our notion of spirits that they breathe. They may cause breathing, as the human spirit; but they themselves breathe not. Hence, since the act itself (breathing) is not conceivable, we are not permitted to construe the term as meaning it. We decide, therefore, to construe the term figuratively, and this the nature of the case requires.

But what does the term 'breath' signify?—what does it express? We reply, it certainly expresses action, but in such a way as not to indicate the precise kind of act performed. This we learn, as we shall presently see, and with much certainty, from the attendant circumstances.

The expression, 'where it listeth,' may be slightly improved thus:—where it sees fit. So far, then, the verse reads thus:—The Spirit breathes where it sees fit.

In the remark next succeeding, to wit: 'and thou hearest the sound thereof,' we have the clue to the particular act expressed by the word 'breath,' which, of itself, is indefinite. But in order to trace out this clue, and show to what it leads, we must examine strictly the meaning of the word rendered 'sound.' This word is met with in the Greek New Testament one hundred and forty-one times; in one hundred and thirty-one of which it is rendered 'voice;' in eight, including the present case, 'sound;' in one, 'noise;' and in one case it is joined with a verb, and rendered 'noised.' Generically, the term expresses sound simply; specifically, a particular kind of sound. Hence, before we can, in a given case, correctly render it into English, we must know what particular kind of sound is meant, or from what subject it proceeds. In the case in hand it was clearly the force, and nothing else, of the preceding substantive, wind, which determined it to be rendered sound. But since the original of wind does not mean wind, but spirit, the presumption is, that the original of sound does not mean sound, but something else.

Now in every other case in the New Testament (a few doubtful ones, perhaps, to be excepted) where it denotes sound proceeding from a person, without distinction as to whom, that sound is the voice of such person heard in the act of speaking. Hence, since in the present case the term denotes sound proceeding from the Spirit, a person, that sound is, if there be any value in induction, determined to be the voice of the Spirit heard in the act of speaking. We therefore decide that voice is the true rendering. But this voice is what is heard in the act, breathing; hence, breathing and speaking must be only two different names for the same act, with this distinction—that breathing is figurative, speaking literal.

So far, then, the verse reads as follows: The Spirit breathes where it sees fit, and you hear its voice; the meaning of which is, The Spirit speaks where it sees fit, and you hear its voice, or what it says.

But are we borne out by facts elsewhere to be collected in asserting of the Spirit that it speaks? We certainly are. The Saviour says, 'When he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth; for he will not speaking of himself, but whatsoever he shall hear, that shall he speaking.' The foregoing conclusion, then, though fully justified by the verse itself, is thus corroborated by facts.

But the Holy Spirit, as an unembodied form, never uttered a monosyllable in a human ear, or communicated a thought to a human being. Only when in man does it speak to him. As the Word became incarnate to save, so the Spirit became embodied to enlighten. But when in man, it then speaks by him, to him, for him. But it has thus spoken only through the prophets and apostles. Hence, what we hear from the Spirit, and all we hear, is what it has spoken by them. Consequently, in construing the word speaking, in the clause the Spirit speaking, we are not to limit it to the mere act of speaking, but to construe it largely as embracing all the prophets and apostles have said, or the entire Word of God. Thus, likewise, are we to construe the word hear in the expression, 'you hear its voice.'

Since, then, the Spirit speaks, what does it speak? The response is, The Truth. Hence it is called 'the Spirit of truth.' But truth is distributed into truth proper, and facts; and facts again, into facts past or history, facts present, and facts future or prophecy. Hence, truth proper, and facts past, present, and future, as far as they involve the question of human salvation, constitute the grand themes on which the Spirit speaks to man. But it was not enough that the Spirit should speak: all it says must be authenticated. Hence its truths are confirmed by its facts; its facts again by the most complex yet simple, strange yet natural, compact yet extended, body of testimony known to or to be conceived by the human mind. It is what the Spirit has thus spoken and authenticated that man hears—and what he thus hears that enlightens him—and what thus enlightens him that he believes—and what he believes that melts him into pity, inspires him with hope, or moves him to action, as the case may be. There is no rescinding this law of nature, or modifying this order of things.

Next, concerning the clause, 'but thou canst not tell whence it cometh and whither it goeth,' which we shall alter but slightly, thus:—but you know not whence it comes and whither it goes, which is a literal rendering of the original. This clause has been for ages past, and still is, the glory and the shame of the blind guide—at once his subterfuge, his decisive argument, his joy, and his puzzle. Who, when the mystic doctor has been pressed on the favorite myth—spiritual influence—has not seen him close the argument with a triumphant air, thus?—'Ah, but thou canst not tell whence it cometh and whither it goeth.' Even Mr. Jeter, like 'the silent owl on stealthy wings,' floats into the gloom of the passage and there disappears. He merely quotes it, with no attempt to explain it, leaving us in charity to hope he may know something about it, but with many a suspicion that he knows nothing.

The clause occurs, slightly varied three times, and but three, in the New Testament—twice in the following extract:—'Jesus answered and said to them, Though I bear record of myself, yet my record is true; for I know whence I came and whither I go; but ye cannot tell whence I came and whither I go.' It is in the form here last occurring, with a slight variation, that the expression is applied to Nicodemus. The Saviour, in the extract, applies it first to himself to express something which he alone knew:—'I know whence I came and whither I go.' He then applies it adversatively to the audience, to indicate that what he knew they did not know:—'but ye cannot tell whence I came and whither I go.' Now, the form of the expressive applied to the audience, and that applied to Nicodemus, mean precisely the same thing, with this difference:—the Saviour applied it to the Jews to express something which they did not know of him, but which they should have known; to Nicodemus he applied it to express something which he did not know of the Spirit, and which at that time, perhaps, he could not know. But what was the thing which Nicodemus did not know? We reply, precisely what the clause says he did not know. But what was this? Simply, 'whence it (the Spirit) comes and whither it goes.' The whence and the whither, then, of the Spirit, was all. But this is not the popular belief. The popular belief is, that the thing which Nicodemus did not know was, how the Spirit operates in regeneration. But the clause says nothing about how the Spirit operates in regeneration—not even whether it operates at all or not; positively nothing about its exerting any supposed secret influence therein. Hence these are not the things of which the clause says Nicodemus was ignorant. The whence and the whither of the Spirit, and no more, is what he did not know.

But because Nicodemus did not know the whence and the whither of the Spirit, does it follow that we are now ignorant of the manner in which the Spirit operates in conversion? Such conclusion has no dependence on such premise, and hence, of course, cannot follow from it. The fact that Nicodemus was ignorant of one thing is no reason why we should be supposed ignorant of a very different thing. Yet this is the popular mode of reasoning from the clause.

That what the clause means may be the better understood, let us somewhat expand the whole passage to which it belongs, by supposing the following train of thought to be passing through the mind of the Saviour. The Spirit, Nicodemus, speaks to men where it sees they will heed its teachings; and you hear its instructions, which you must receive in order to be enlightened by it; but of the Spirit itself, in other respects, you are ignorant. You know not whence it comes and whither it goes. I have told you what it does, which you may understand; but of the Spirit itself, you must remain in other respects ignorant until I am glorified. Then it will be given—when you will have no difficulty in understanding what it is not proper I should at present make known to you.

The popular interpretation of this clause is worthy of notice. It is this:—You, the human family, cannot comprehend how the Spirit exerts its mysterious influences on the human heart in regeneration. It is as incomprehensible to you as the operations of the wind. But all the Saviour says is this:—'Whence it (the Spirit) comes and whither it goes, you, Nicodemus, know not.' How singularly does the speculation contrast with the truth!

Finally, we come to the concluding clause of the verse:—'So is every one that is born of the Spirit.' And first in regard to the particle rendered 'so.' The primary and usual meaning of this particle is 'in this way.' It occurs in the Greek Testament upwards of two hundred times, and is generally rendered so, in the sense of in this way. Now, a chief rule in translating is this: to render a term invariably by its primary and usual meaning where they agree, unless the sense positively forbid it. In the present instance, therefore, since the sense does not forbid it, we are compelled to abide by the rule, and hence to render the particle in this way. But in rendering it thus, the clause to which it belongs becomes elliptical, as may be perceived thus: In this way is every one that is born of the Spirit. The sense is here clearly incomplete; hence we involuntarily ask, how? In order to complete the sense we must supply the ellipsis. But here we come in contact with another rule, which says, Avoid an ellipsis where the sense can be as well expressed without it. Here, then, by the force of one rule, we come in conflict with another; and, as both cannot stand, the question arises, Which must yield? In all such cases, the rule which respects expressing the sense, is held to yield to the one which respects determining the sense, the latter being necessary, the former only discretionary. Hence we must abide by the rule which requires us to render the particle in this way, and supply the ellipsis. But in supplying an ellipsis we are not to act arbitrarily. Indeed, we are no more at liberty to act arbitrarily in supplying an ellipsis than we are in creating one. The omitted word must be such as occurs to the mind readily, and, when supplied, such as satisfies it by completing the sense in an easy, natural way.

In the present instance we supply the ellipsis thus:—In this way is (born) every one that is born of the Spirit. Instantly the mind seems to accept this as correct. It gives completeness to the sense, and leaves us asking no questions. It imparts to us a feeling of satisfaction, such only as we feel when the truth flashes full on the mind. We conclude, then, that it is correct.

Substituting, then, the word begotten, which is required by the sense, for the word born, the reason for which we shall assign elsewhere, and the whole verse reads thus:—'The Spirit breathes where it sees fit, and you hear its voice, but you know not whence it comes and whither it goes: in this way is (begotten) every one that is begotten by the Spirit.' How, then, is a person begotten by the Spirit? By hearing what it says, or being enlightened by its truth. 'Of his own will begat he us with the word of truth. 'Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the Word of God.' Is not the conclusion overwhelming?

With a few additional remarks we shall dismiss the passage. The clause, 'you know not whence it comes and whither it goes,' is to be limited to Nicodemus, or rather to the time preceding the descent of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost. For, since then, in no sense can it be said of Christians that they know not whence the Spirit comes and whither it goes. We possess information respecting it which Nicodemus did not possess, which enabled the Saviour to say of him what cannot be truly said of us.

In the outset of the present argument, we assumed that the verse in hand contains an explanation of the expression, 'born of the Spirit.' In further confirmation of this, if further confirmation can be thought necessary, we once more request attention to the closing expression of the verse. This expression does not contain a reference to the new birth generally, but only to so much of it as consists in being begotten of the Spirit. Hence it does not say, in this way is every one born that is born again; but, in this way is every one begotten that is begotten by the Spirit. Being begotten by the Spirit, then, is strictly what it explains. It states the manner in which this is done—to wit, by hearing or believing what the Spirit says. And how easily and naturally does the whole verse develop itself into this conclusion! Each step in the investigation rests on the firmest basis; every position is determined by some simple and obvious rule in sacred criticism: and the conclusion accords strictly with the other conclusions already arrived at in this chapter from other portions of Holy Writ."

REPORT OF GENERAL MEETING.

THE Annual Meeting was held in Bond-street chapel, Birmingham, on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, the 14th, 15th, and 16th of August. Before the formal business commenced, several of the members partook of tea, and much pleasure was experienced in social and friendly conversation. At seven o'clock Brother TICKLE was voted to the presidency: Brother CHEW gave out a hymn, and Bro. JABEZ INWARDS engaged in prayer. Our Brother KING then read the statistics of the churches, some of which were of a very cheering kind, and others of a somewhat painful character. It was pleasing, however, to learn that there were reports of a most encouraging nature, and we believe at the closing of the reading, that all present felt disposed to thank God and take courage, for the indications of His blessing which were thus given to the meeting.

One of the most interesting features of the Annual Meeting is the delightful opportunity which is afforded for the brethren and the sisters from all parts of the land to meet together, for the purpose of hearing good news in relation to the kingdom of God. We noticed that a larger number was present than at the last year's meeting. The letters were read, and the addition of baptized believers amounted to five hundred and ten. Letters were then read from individuals, viz. from Alexander Campbell, and from Mr. Barker, of the United Kingdom Alliance; one from a brother, suggesting the importance of using at the table of the Lord unintoxicating wine; and others. Brother JAMES WALLIS read the Financial Report of the Nottingham Committee. The meeting concluded with singing and prayer. The letters were various and interesting. From many parts the cry came up, "Come over and help us." Earnest evangelists are wanted in the glorious work; the fields are white unto the harvest, and we pray God that he may send more laborers into the harvest. Leicester, Bradford, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and Shrewsbury, are among the places from which earnest appeals have been sent. In many large places the truth is held and defended by a few, and we hope the time is not very remote when a response will be given, by sending amongst them able and beloved brethren, to proclaim the simple and soul-saving truth as it is in Jesus.

On Wednesday the business meeting convened at nine a.m. A hymn was sung, and Bro. CHEW engaged in prayer. It was suggested by Brother FRASER, that in view of the solemn subjects which would be discussed, the deliberations should be occasionally suspended for the purpose of offering prayer to our Heavenly Father. Bro. TAYLOR made a few practical and important suggestions, and hoped that our meeting would be as friendly and social as possible. Several of the brethren then spoke on the subject of Evangelization, and various suggestions were made in reference to the teaching and instruction of the young. The labors of Bro. King and Chew were referred to by several delegates in the most satisfactory manner. Their labors have been especially blessed in the proclamation of the truth as it is in Jesus.

At the opening of the afternoon meeting, Bro. WILLIAM TURNER offered up prayer. Several important subjects were discussed, in which many of the brethren freely took part. A large number sat down to tea, after which a very interesting public meeting was held. Our venerable brother, JAMES WALLIS, presided, who, after the singing of a hymn, engaged in prayer. Brother McDUGALL read the 15th chapter of Luke, upon which Brother COLLIN, of Mayport, addressed the audience on the character of God, as being full of mercy and love, and earnestly implored the people to make the all-important subject of Christianity a personal one. Brother TICKLE spoke of the glorious things of the kingdom of God, and both clearly and feelingly showed the excellency of the Christian dispensation, when compared or contrasted with the Jewish. He then compared the sacrifice of Jesus with the offerings of bulls and goats, dilating upon the great price paid for the redemption of lost and ruined man. He pointed out the glorious hope of the Christian, and the recompence of eternal reward, which, by the mercy of God, and the love and death of the Lord Jesus Christ, is held in reversion for all those who are faithful unto death. Brother CHEW spoke of the government of God, and man's fall from a state of purity and perfect restoration to the favor of his Creator, exhorting all preachers, private and public, to use plain words and to be in earnest, and entreated every individual Christian to be a worker. He then said that God was the builder of his church, and that he had given a perfect order for its guidance; that class distinctions in the church were unknown: the rich man was humbled, the poor man was exalted, and the once crucified but now risen Saviour was its glorious Head. In conclusion he exhorted every disciple of the Lord to be bold, faithful, and fearless, as well as affectionate in the maintenance of the truth. The CHAIRMAN briefly addressed the unconverted, imploring them to accept the offers of God's love. Brother KING added an earnest speech on conversion to God, and the way into the kingdom of heaven, shewing the necessity of a change of heart before baptism, or any Christian ordinance cannot be of the slightest avail. The highly interesting meeting was then concluded with praise and prayer.

On Thursday morning the business commenced at half-past nine. Brother TENER gave us an interesting account of the origin and success of the revival of religion in Ireland. Belfast and the city of Derry were particularly referred to as possessing a large number of baptized believers, many of whom have come out from the Presbyterians, and several have become obedient to the faith. He said that a great work is to be accomplished. I ask not now for aid, but I wish to go back to Ireland with the power to express your sympathies in the great work which is now going on, and I hope that one or two Evangelists may be located in those districts. We have endeavored to aid England and Scotland, and now we ask you to help us, in order that much good may be done. Brother CHEW followed in a thoroughly practical speech, during the course of which he read a very interesting letter from a Baptist minister whom the writer well knows, expressive of the change of mind which has taken place, and also of his sympathies being strongly in favor of the principles which are identified with the present Reformation.

In the afternoon Bro. Jabez INWARDS, in proposing a vote of thanks to Bro. James Wallis and David King, for valuable services rendered in the joint editorship of the Millennial Harbinger, made some remarks upon the literature of the Reformation. He referred to the Harbinger, and the pleasure he had experienced in reading it. Some of the articles he conceived to be of a very high order, and were greatly calculated to interest those who are within, and greatly to benefit those who are without. Reference was then made to the little serial issued by Bro. King, called Quo Warranto? It was replete with matter of an interesting kind. Our Scottish literature was also of a character of which we need not be ashamed, and he heartily recommended a much wider circulation of the publications which contained such clear and full expositions of the great truths of the Christian religion. Several of the delegates expressed their cordial approval of what had been said, and of the pleasure they had experienced in reading the afore-named serials. Brother LUDBROOK said that in our Annual Reports we heard but little or nothing of what the sisters were doing. He then referred to a work called "Haste to the Rescue," written by a lady of Shrewsbury. Much good had been done, and he believed that sisters might be usefully employed in visiting many of those without. The meeting associated such importance with the remarks, as to request that the observations might be submitted in the form of a resolution, which was done. A hymn was sung, Bro. LUDBROOK prayed, and thus in the midst of much good feeling and harmony the meeting for business came to an end. A large number of friends assembled to tea in the school-room, where a very pleasant hour was spent in the interchange of thought and conversation; after which a most interesting and profitable meeting was held, over which Bro. William TURNER presided. Prayer was offered by Brother EVANS, of Swansea. Bro. HARRIS then spoke of the love of God as manifested in the gift of Jesus the Christ. Brother FRASER spoke of charity or love, and in terms of great affection entreated all the brethren who were present among them from a distance to be love-bearers to the various churches. Brother BRETT spoke also of divine love, and earnestly invited any who were present who had not yet realized the possession of love to obtain it, for God was ready, for Christ's sake, to impart it. A few verses were then sung with deep and solemn feeling. Brother CARNDUFF was pleased that at such meetings as the present we could speak freely, and say things which are of a practical character. He then spoke of Primitive Christianity. Brother EVANS addressed the meeting on the practical nature of the doctrines of Christianity, and was listened to with great attention, and we believe with much profit. Brother BURDETT spoke of the church, and Bro. COTTERELL read several portions from the Sacred Scriptures, and made thereon some appropriate remarks. Brother KING spoke of the curious things which exist in the world of mind. Love is a glorious thing. He then alluded to the evils of party-making, yet notwithstanding he was more than ever determined to make a party, and that too in the church. That party should be the love party, and he would select the most eminent in love to be its leader, until all the members of the church were influenced by the same divine feeling, and it should be considered that a small unkindness would be a great offence. We should mourn over offences, and it was right that we should afflict ourselves before God. Brother JAMES WALLIS observed that John was an old man when he wrote his letters, and in tender and affectionate terms dilated upon the love of God and the blessings of Christian faith and communion. There were a few important facts to which he wished to direct their attention. 1, Jesus became incarnate; 2, he was filled with wisdom; 3, he was baptized in Jordan, and the heavens opened; 4, he was filled with the Holy Spirit; 5, he worked miracles; 6, he died and was buried; 7, he rose again, ascended to heaven, and is now enthroned at his Father's right hand. He then referred to the outpouring of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost, and concluded one of the most earnest addresses to which we ever listened. Bro. JABEZ INWARDS spoke of the past and the present, of life and death, of those who since last year had departed this life, of the glory of the gospel, of the completeness of the plan of salvation, of the blessings of communion, and of the eternal hope. Bros. DOWLING, MORRIS and WOOLER spoke with much earnestness and sincerity. Brother CHEW made a series of very practical remarks: his reasoning was clear, and his advice faithful and wholesome, and it will doubtless have its proper influence upon the minds of all present. A hymn was sung, and the benediction pronounced.

The information which follows, under the head Statistics of the Churches, is collated from the schedules transmitted to the meeting.

The following Resolutions were considered and passed:—

I. That the business of this meeting be attended to in the order following:—1, Read statistical information contained in schedules.—2, Read propositions and suggestions contained in schedules and letters from churches, but defer the consideration of them.—3, Read the Resolutions passed at the meeting held in Birmingham last August.—4, Receive the Report from the Committee at Nottingham.—5, Appoint Committee for year ensuing.—6, Consider the propositions and suggestions already read from schedules and letters.—7, Consider suggestions and propositions not contained in letters, if any.—8, Appoint place and time for next meeting.

II. That Brother Jabez Inwards be requested to act as Secretary.

III. That Brethren J. Hine, J. Wallis, T. Wallis, W. Powers, and H. Meekly be kindly requested to act as the Evangelist Committee for the ensuing year.

IV. That only the amounts received and expended be inserted in the Report of the Meeting, and that the Financial Statement be printed and forwarded to the churches or brethren who have contributed; and that this Resolution be considered as permanent until it be rescinded at a future meeting.

V. That considering the vast field here presented, and the numerous openings around us, it would be desirable for Bros. King and Chew to continue their labors as at present arranged, making Birmingham their starting point, and the centre of an extensive sphere of usefulness.

VI. That Bros. King and Chew be requested, as far as consistent with the requirements of Birmingham, to extend their labors to Leicester, Manchester, and Bolton.

VII. That the meeting confine its attention to questions directly affecting evangelistic labor.

VIII. That letters and communications from individuals or societies (not churches) be announced to future meetings, but not read, unless the meeting resolve to that effect.

IX. That a document be drawn up for the purpose of obtaining individual signatures expressive of their sympathy with the object of the United Kingdom Alliance.

X. That the next Annual Meeting be held at Leicester, to commence the second Tuesday in August.

XI. That while disclaiming the idea of clergy and laity, we feel the need of earnest and able Evangelists. That we will do our best to seek out suitable men who will give themselves to the work of Evangelists, and that we will do our best also honorably and generously to supply their pecuniary needs.

XII. That the thanks of this meeting be expressed to Bros. James Wallis and David King, for their valuable services in connection with the editorship of the Millennial Harbinger; and to Brother Milner, for his able advocacy of truth in the Christian Advocate; and this meeting pledges itself to recommend the circulation of these valuable periodicals, believing that an increased circulation will be conducive to the enlightenment of the church, and the spread of pure and undefiled religion.

XIII. That our sisters in the Lord throughout the country be urged to increased devotedness to the cause of God and of humanity, in seeking and reclaiming the outcast, by home visitation, by tract distribution, by collecting females together for reading the Scriptures, teaching the young, and any other means calculated to bless mankind and glorify God.

XIV. That the pastors or presidents of the churches be requested to read the Resolutions passed at this meeting to the churches.

Bro. TENER, of Ireland, gave notice as under—

That at our next Annual Meeting the brethren in Ireland intend to propose that one or two Evangelists be located in Belfast, to labor in the North of Ireland for a year or eighteen months.

The following Report of the Committee in Nottingham was read :—

"The Elders of the Church in Nottingham, who act as a Committee to receive and disburse the contributions sent for the support of the Evangelists, have but little more to report to this meeting, than to present a statement of the Treasurer's accounts for the last twelve months. Most, if not all present, are aware that the contributions formerly transmitted from the brethren in Scotland, have this year generally been withheld, and applied to the support of Bro. Rotherham, who, since our last Annual Meeting, has been laboring among the brethren in that country.—Brethren King, Chew, and Evans have been in part, or wholly sustained by your contributions during the year, and their labors have been reported from time to time in the Harbinger and our other periodicals. At present there is only a small balance in hand, as compared with that of the last two years. Still, it is matter of thankfulness to know, that, up to this time, the contributions have been equal to the exigencies of circumstances. The brethren in Nottingham are still willing to serve the churches in this matter; but should there have been any better or more scriptural plan suggested, since the last meeting, for conveying support to the Evangelists, the brethren may rest assured that there is no feeling in existence on the part of the Committee to prevent its immediate adoption."

The Financial Statement was then read and approved. It appeared that, including the balance in hand last August, £345 15s. has been received, and £313 13s. 2d. expended.

EXTRACTS FROM THE LETTERS.

BIRMINGHAM.

Dear Brethren,—With heartfelt pleasure and gratitude to God we meet, and welcome you, and we pray that our Heavenly Father will bless our meeting and deliberations to the abundant progress of Christianity in this town, and throughout the kingdom.

Referring to the letters of our brethren last year, we find this statement :—"One church has determined to be guided by the revealed will of God, and forsake every path not in accordance with the laws of the kingdom." The church at Bond-street was the one there spoken of; our beloved Brother Chew, the then pastor, had seen beyond the narrow limits of sectarianism, and succeeded in convincing the church, or at least a large majority of its members, of their duty to come out from it—to forsake it with its clouds and mysticisms for the pure and unadulterated Christianity of the Word of God. Calumniators and detractors from time to time attempted to hinder the good work, but the Lord blessed his efforts to their full accomplishment.

The brethren here were led, by various circumstances, to consider the desirability of inviting the brethren at Cherry-street to unite with them; and in March an invitation was sent, by the unanimous request of the church. After much prayerful deliberation and consultation together, the union thus sought was effected. We trust and pray that it may be a happy one, and tend greatly to the glory of God in the more efficient efforts for the spread of Christianity in the town and neighbourhood. It was arranged that Brothers King and Chew should both continue their labors as evangelists, with an understanding that while one was laboring here, the other should direct his energies for the furtherance and spread of the gospel elsewhere. We are thankful to add, that the Lord has abundantly blessed their efforts, in the conversion of sinners, and the awakening of members of other churches to see the pure light of God's Word. We pray that God will long continue them in their labors of love and usefulness.

We have among us other brethren who exert themselves in the preaching of the gospel, and avail themselves of opportunities to proclaim it in our streets. Truly we have before us a plentiful harvest in the multitudes around us who are careless for their souls' salvation. The reapers cannot be too many.

There are in our immediate vicinity other large towns: for instance, Wolverhampton, Walsall, Wednesbury, and some others, having large populations. We have it in contemplation to organize an effort to establish churches in these towns, or some of them, and shall be thankful if the brethren, in their deliberations, can assist us in this matter.

We have now to mention our financial affairs, and in this respect our desire has exceeded our ability. We have been obliged, several times, to appeal to the Evangelist Committee for assistance; and we give you our hearty and grateful thanks for their prompt and cordial responses to those appeals. We hope the time is not far distant when we shall, by our own contributions, be able to carry on the Lord's cause here. We further trust that we shall never forget our individual duty to give unto the Lord to the full extent of our ability, and that with willing hearts freely.

We have some sick and poor brethren and sisters, whose claims upon us we, to the best of our ability, attend to. Some cases of protracted sickness have called for extra effort in this respect.

In conclusion, we would suggest to the brethren, that considering the vast field here presented, and the numerous openings around us, it would be desirable for brethren King and Chew to continue their labours as at present arranged; making Birmingham their starting-point, and the centre of an extensive sphere of usefulness.

BANFF.

The greater increase than usual is attributed in some measure to the labors of Brother Beattie, whom we had five months, and Brother Rotherham, whom we had two months, as evangelists. They both obtained large meetings and attentive hearers. May the seed sown prove for the glory of our God, and the increase of the kingdom of our Lord; and may the blessing of God rest upon you all in your meetings.

LEICESTER.

The church here was established in February last, at which time our present meeting-place in the Temperance Hall was secured. We have, by the imparting of the truth, and the blessing of God, had the joy to see our numbers increase. We have been kindly assisted by Bros. J. Wallis, David King, S. J. Chew, R. Mumby, G. Blair, and Jabez Inwards. The meetings have sometimes been held in the large hall, at which the attendance has been very good; and though we have been both misrepresented and opposed, we believe there are large numbers who are anxious to listen to the truth. There is much to encourage us. During the last six months twenty-two have been buried with Jesus in baptism, and three received from the Baptist churches. As a church we are blessed with peace and prosperity; but we greatly need an earnest and intelligent evangelist. We affectionately ask you for help, kindly thanking you for the past. The brethren earnestly desire that the next Annual Meeting may be held at Leicester, believing thereby much good would be done, and the church edified.

PERTH.

Beloved brethren in Jesus assembled in Birmingham.—We desire, on your behalf, the richest blessing of our Heavenly Father; and trust your deliberations will greatly promote the spread of the gospel.

In consequence of the late arrival of the Schedule forwarded by Bro. King, and now the absence of our elder, we are unable to give our statistics in full, but may inform you, that during the past year, the two small churches in this city similarly contending for simple and pure Christianity have united themselves; and that our present number is about 87 members. We are striving to preserve the unity of the Spirit, and to spread the savor of Jesus' name around.

Bro. Rotherham will inform you of his labours here for the past two months, and of his and our hope that he will be enabled to remain in this important city for twelve months longer at least.

Partly in the hope of this, and partly in consequence of needing in any case a more commodious hall, we have just entered a very eligible building, commonly known as The Scorne and Perth Masons' Hall, No. 14, High-street, Perth.

We have one elder, Mr A. Greig, King-street; and two deacons, Mr. P. Strang, grocer, Canal-street, and Mr. P. Campbell, jun. dyer, Methven-street; to either of whom communications may be addressed.

PETER CAMPBELL, JUN.

PETER STRANG.

August 13, 1860.

Beloved brethren,—You will, I am sure, receive a few lines from me with kindly sympathy in my unavoidable and much regretted absence from you at the present interesting season.

I have been deferring the penning of this note from post to post, in the hope of being thereby enabled to inform you of a completed arrangement for twelve months labour on my part in the fair city of Perth.

In consequence of some delay, however, on the part of some of the Scottish churches in responding to a leading proposal from Glasgow to that effect—all I am able to say is, that an arrangement for the above-named purpose is pending, which, I hope, will shortly be satisfactorily concluded; in which event I will take care that information shall be forwarded to the Harbinger regarding it.

Suffice it to say, that Glasgow has offered to take a lead in the matter, by promising a liberal sum on condition of being responded to by the other churches in Scotland.

I much regret that I am not able, at this moment, to say the arrangement is complete.

My first year in Scotland has been one of considerable disadvantage, arising principally from the inaptness of the churches to lay hold of the work promptly and heartily. This latter I attribute mainly to their having been so little engaged in the work of evangelization for some years past.

However, I hope a better state of things may soon be realized. Work actually and continuously done I look upon as the most likely means to that desirable end.

On looking over the past year, I feel cheered by being able to count instances of usefulness sufficient to prompt me to thank God and take courage.

On my first preliminary journey into Scotland, a brief visit in Ayrshire resulted in 7 immersions.

My labours in Dundee were neither so happy nor so fruitful as I could have desired, and, perhaps, did anticipate. Could I have changed certain eminent names, I might have been disposed to take up the proverb—What shall be done to the man that comes after the King? Still, I believe that some share in the gaining of some additions, may be to me some gratification. January and February happily spent in the far North, (Banffshire) resulted in six immersions at the time, and several since of which I have received information, to the number of about as many more, to the best of my recollection. Two little churches are springing up to the West of Banff, in Portsoy and Findochty.

The months of March, April, and May spent in Pathhead, Kircaldy, gained four immersions.

Since June 1st I have been toiling in Perth—having spoken upwards of 40 times in the open-air, besides indoors. No immediate fruit has been reaped—but the importance of the city, and the interesting condition of the church, satisfy me of the desirability of the fore-named pending arrangement.

Did time permit, I might add several important items, especially respecting labor in Perth—some interesting accounts of assaults received—defences offered—discussions held—but my time absolutely forbids.

Pray, my beloved brethren, accept this hurried note as my token of unabated attachment and good-will.

MANCHESTER.

● Brethren beloved in the Lord,—We deem it a privilege to be again permitted to address you, and in doing so, our earnest prayer to the "Father of all our mercies" is, that unity, peace, and concord may characterize all your meetings; and that in your deliberations, the leading feature may be the extension of our dear Redeemer's kingdom in the salvation of precious souls. As we anticipate two or three of the brethren will be present to take part in your counsels, we consider it needless to enter into detail as to our condition and prospects; suffice it to say, that although from the statistics you do not see a large increase of converts, still, we trust that those who have "put on Christ" are walking in faith, and growing in knowledge and divine favour.

Our primary object in this is to request that we may be favoured with a visit from our Bro. King, for at least three months. The church, as you are aware, is still in an unorganized state, being without either elders or deacons, Bro. King having, on his removal hence, requested certain brethren to act in that capacity for a time, until further experience would indicate more clearly the fitness of the brethren. As it is now desired by the church to appoint its officers, the assistance of Bro. King as the evangelist would materially tend to a wise and amicable arrangement. We therefore request, and trust you will advise, that at an early period after the close of the meetings as it may be convenient, Bro. King visit us for the time above mentioned.

We intend (p.v.) to continue our quarterly contributions to the Evangelist Fund, and we trust that liberal aid will be rendered by the brotherhood, in order that the glorious tidings of salvation, in all their beauty and primitive simplicity, may be more extensively made known to our fellow-men.

JOHN ROSS.

SHREWSBURY.

SWANSEA.

With feelings of the deepest thankfulness we contemplate the year that is now almost at a close: for if we, as a church, take a retrospect of the past, our hearts dilate with joy, in consideration of the goodness and mercy of God our Saviour towards us. Since Bro. Evans commenced his labours of love amongst us, success has attended his exertions and unwearied labours, the fruit of which is seen in the result of thirty precious souls having been added to the saved. This has been followed up by the reviving visit of our dear Bro. King, the result of which eternity alone will show.

We desire to return our sincere thanks to the brethren generally, for the kind manner in which they responded to our desire in sending our beloved Bro. Evans amongst us, and we would entreat that his labours may be continued, at least, for another year. If so, the field of his usefulness will not be confined to Swansea alone, but extended to the surrounding towns and villages in its vicinity.

WHITEHAVEN.

The church has much pleasure in calling attention to its increase, which, though but small, has been partially brought about in a manner somewhat different to the usual way. Through the instrumentality of its beloved deacon, Wm. Brown, (and which it suggests to those brethren who are in a position to follow it up, as a means of doing good) extracts of news contained in the monthlies published by the brethren, from articles exposing the errors of the sects, and those setting forth the right way, from the same source, were secured admission from time to time in the general news columns of one of our local weekly papers; and after being followed up for awhile, were supplemented by republishing, in the advertising columns of that and another weekly paper, the "letters to the people," by our dear Brother Milner.

There were other communications, varying in interest, which want of space will not permit us to insert. The letter from Bro. G. Y. Tickle to Bro. A. Campbell, according to the resolution of the last Annual Meeting, and Mr. Campbell's reply, will be found on another page.

JABEZ INWARDS, Secretary.

BOLTON.

I write to inform you of our progress at Bolton. We have had three additions to the church of late, viz. a young man and his wife, who had been members of the Baptist church for six or seven years, but who, on being convinced of the truth, joined our church; and the wife of Brother Corf, of Wigan, who had long acknowledged that Jesus was the Christ, and yet delayed to put him on by immersion. On Lord's-day, July 22nd, immediately after the supper, all our hearts were rejoiced by her acknowledging him, and desiring to serve him in his appointed way. She was immersed on the Tuesday following. On Lord's-day, July 29, the commodious room taken by the brethren was opened. Is it not deplorable, that in a town like Bolton, containing nearly 80,000 inhabitants, the only church constituted according to the pattern of the apostolic churches, should not number above thirty members? Yet so it is. Not that there is any lack of what is called religious sentiment, for the town of late has been turned upside down by the revivalists, and people of all sects have gone in thousands, leaving their own ministers that they might be in time for the "special service;" and Baptist, Methodist, Independent, and Episcopalian ministers have had united services, to preach the gospel, at which was present a Presbyterian minister from America. But, alas! how few could give a reason for the hope that was in them, according to the Scriptures. The visit of Brother Chew, in the midst of this commotion, has created a deep impression, and a thorough study of the Scriptures. The large room which we have taken is in the centre of the town, and has a good entrance. It has been put in repair, and at the opening Brethren Perkins, from Manchester, Bowman and Mackenzie, from St. Helens, took part in proclaiming the gospel. Bros. Gaskell and Macdougall were also present with us from Wigan. The day was one of gladness to the brethren, who hope to be instrumental in bringing many from darkness to light.

NETTLETON (WILTSHIRE.)

Last Lord's day, in a limpid stream and at a picturesque spot near the above village, four persons were buried with Christ in baptism, wherein also they were raised with him through the faith of the operation of God, having been previously begotten by the Word through my feeble instrumentality. On this occasion a large concourse of spectators from the neighboring villages assembled to witness the good confession. I had thus an excellent opportunity of relating to them also the tale of redemption. It was a rustic but most attentive audience, and I doubt not that many a heart felt the potency of this tale of unparalleled love, and retired to their homes pondering these things in their hearts.

ROBERT DILLON.

THETFORD, NORFOLK.

On Lord's-day, August 5th, we were privileged with a visit from our dear Brother Chew; and our meeting place was filled with a good number of hearers, when we met for breaking of bread, in the morning, and also at the proclaiming of the truth in the evening. Bro. Chew discoursed in the morning on the subject of "The Lord's Supper as often as the Lord's day;" and in the evening, on "Jesus Christ the light that shineth." The gospel was also proclaimed four times on Lord's-day in the market-place, and also once on Tuesday evening. On Monday and Tuesday evenings lectures were delivered in the Town Hall, and on the last-named day to a very large and attentive audience. We believe there are good openings for establishing the truth in the Eastern counties; and we respectfully say to any brethren who pass our way, Come over and help us.

FAMILY CIRCLE.

I'VE NOTHING TO LIVE FOR.

"THE Sunday School interested me very much once. I had a class of girls to teach, and I loved them, but of course they were moved into a higher class, and now I feel that my work has been taken from me; and really I've nothing to live for."

"No doubt, if I could have established the Sick Society it would have been a good thing. I worked very hard to form a Committee. I bought books, drew up rules, and commenced mapping out visiting districts; but I could find none willing to help. I ought not to have been treated so, but I can do no more, and really now I've nothing to live for."

"They ought to have placed that wool mat in a better position at the bazaar: it cost me considerable trouble and expense: it is, however, like everything else I attempt, pushed on one side. Miss Chandler's work is well exhibited, and her suggestions are always adopted: but no doubt she is more clever than I am, for there is nothing I can do properly; indeed I've nothing to live for."

Look in at that cottage door. See you not the widow weeping there? Her only son is dead. Sorrowful and alone she walks earth's vale of tears. "She has no children to care for." True, and she has none to love. The name of mother has died away from that lonely hearth. In solitude and patient hope she treads time's careworn path. Have you no word of sympathy to speak? Have you nothing to live for?

Adown that lane before you stands a mud-built hut. Just enter, and on a bed in that darkened corner you will see a fading form. Look at her. Seventeen summers have scarcely passed over her young head, yet the journey of life is nearly done.

A life of sin and shame that life has been; but listen, and you will hear her tell of One whose blood cleanseth from all sin—of One who has said to her troubled soul, "Thy sins are forgiven thee"—"go, and sin no more." Scanty fare is hers, and scantier clothing—no friend has she to read afresh those glorious promises which support her dying moments. Have you really nothing to live for?

Look out, instead of looking in, and you will find there's work for all. There are tears to wipe; the troubled to be soothed; the careless to be warned; the ignorant to be instructed; and never can the Christian say, "I've nothing to live for."

"Then say not thou, There is no place for me,
No niche to fill in God's own family.
Revere all gifts, for all are from above;
But covet earnestly the gift of LOVE:
Love for the risen Head, the Lamb who died,
The Shepherd-King, the Saviour crucified;—

Love to each member of the blood-bought flock,
The church foundation on the living Rock;
Love for a dying world—for friend—for foe—
For all who care not Jesus' love to know:
Love, tenderest love, for those the Shepherd blessed—Careless thou THEM. Be THOU by HIM cared!"

IS PERFECTION OF CHARACTER ATTAINABLE IN THIS LIFE?

SOME Christians believe that perfection of character is attainable in this state, and they argue that God would never give commands which it is impossible to obey; and as the Saviour says, "Be ye perfect, as your Father who is in heaven is perfect," they suppose perfection attainable. But there are three considerations which, I think, prove that it is not attainable in this state of existence:—First, OBSERVATION. In vain we look for it, even amongst those justly denominated the excellent of the earth. We can see the mote in this eye, and a beam in that—we can perceive the kindling eye of passion, the hasty word, the coldness and lukewarmness frequently displayed, and we sigh over the imperfection of our brethren. Second, by EXPERIENCE. Here there is a wider field for our observations than the sayings and doings of our brethren. There are the motives, and feelings, and affections—the thoughts and imaginations of our hearts. Let us take an impartial view of all these, and if we sigh over the imperfection of our brethren, we shall weep for our own. Thirdly, all the warnings and exhortations of the Scriptures are predicated upon this view of our imperfect state. Will a time ever arrive in our life's history, when these warnings and exhortations will be unnecessary? Will a time ever arrive when we shall have reached above ordinances? While we are in this state, and however great our attainments, sin and imperfection cleave to us. If we are so blinded by self-esteem as to think that we "have attained, or are already perfect," the New Testament is not for us. We do not plead for imperfection. God forbid; but we do plead for a consciousness of the actual state we are in, that, if possible, some good fruit may be extracted from this bitter root. Viewing ourselves thus as we really are, should it not lead us to great patience and forbearance towards our brethren, "considering ourselves, lest we also be tempted?" Should it not lead us to watch and pray, lest we enter into temptation?—to be very careful to attend to all the means of grace, and the warnings and exhortations of the Lord and his Apostles? The Saviour says, after you have done all say, "we are unprofitable servants—we have done what it was our duty to do." Jesus is our Great Exemplar, and would not give an imperfect law. Perfection is to be our aim; but, alas for us: if Jesus were not a Priest, as well as a Prophet and King. He offered himself without spot to God, and ever liveth to make intercession for us.

There is a sense, however, in which every Christian is perfect, and "made meet for the inheritance of the saints in light." The moment a person believes and obeys the truth, he is in this condition. Who can gainsay it? He has approach into the holiest through the blood of Jesus, can call God his Father, and stand with acceptance before Him. And he does anticipate a time "When the soul from sin for ever free,

Shall mourn its power no more,
But clothed in spotless purity,
Redeeming love adore."

A PUZZLE AND THE ANSWER

THE following, which "The Israelite Is-deed" has taken from the Jewish Talmud we commend to the consideration of such modern speculators as teach that all sin belongs to the flesh, and that per omnia secula, the soul, beyond death, will never be punished on account of sin. It may be that we shall furnish them with a new weapon, for certainly the reasoning of the Roman Emperor is more cogent than aught from them which has yet met our eye.

The Emperor Antoninus, in his conversation with R. Rabbi, asked the Rabbi How can God—according to thy religion—punish a sinner after death? If he summons the soul or spirit of man after it has abandoned the body, now dead, will it say: "My Lord, thou knowest that I came pure out of thine hand, and that I am unable to sin, as there is no earthly lust in my substance. It is the body, the flesh, and

"the blood which transgressed thy holy law." The body, if summoned, will say: "Lord, thou knowest that I am nothing but a lump of earth; not I, but the soul which thou hast given into me, induced me to do all that I have done. Now, since that spirit left me, I have not done anything, neither good nor bad." Which of both will God punish? The Rabbi answered: I will tell thee a parable, O Cæsar, by which thou shalt understand the judgment of God. There was once a king, who possessed a garden of wonderful beauty, and in which the fruits ripened earlier than anywhere else. The king had great trouble with his own servants, the keepers and watchmen of the garden—they could not resist the temptation to eat of the precious fruits—they were, therefore, punished and dismissed. At last he put a blind man and a lame man in the garden, to watch and to keep it. When the precious fruits ripened, the lame keeper said to the blind: "O could'st thou see with mine eyes, or could I walk with thy legs! How beautiful are these fruits, and how profusely are they placed upon the trees, and how sweet must they be to eat!" After a long consultation, they agreed upon the following plan: The blind man, who had sound legs, took the lame man with the sound eyes, upon his shoulder, and directed him how to reach the fruit; and thus satisfy both their lusts. Next day the king visited his garden, and observed that many of the precious fruits were stolen. He summoned the keepers before him, and said: Which of you has stolen my fruits? The lame man answered: "O! my king, thou knowest that I cannot use my legs; and, were the fruits even of precious gold, I could not reach them." The blind man said: "O! my king, I am blind; I cannot see either the tree or its fruits: it was therefore not I who stole them." But the king was convinced that none else but the keepers could have taken the fruits of his garden; he commanded therefore the lame to be put upon the shoulders of the blind, and then punished them together, as they had committed the crime together. So will be the judgment of God. At the day of judgment, God will unite again soul and body; there will be again a living man; and then he will receive the reward for what he has done while in this life.

"TAKE HOLD OF MY HAND."

"TAKE hold of my hand," says the little one, when she reaches a slippery place, or when something frightens her. With the fingers clasped tightly around the parent's hand, she steps cheerfully and bravely along, clinging a little closer when the way is crowded or difficult, and happy in the beautiful strength of childish faith. "Take hold of my hand," says the young convert, trembling with the eagerness of his love. Full well he knows that if he rely on any strength of his own, he will stumble and fall; but if the Master reach forth his hand, he may walk with unwearied foot, even on the crested wave. The waters of strife or of sorrow shall not overwhelm him, if he but keep fast hold of the Saviour.

"Take hold of my hand," falters the mother, feeling that she is all too weak for the great responsibilities that throng in her path. Where shall she learn the greatness of the mission—the importance of the field that has been assigned to her? and learning it, how shall she fulfil it, if she have not the sustaining, constant presence of One who loves his people?

"Take hold of my hand," whispers the aged one, tottering on through the shadows and snows of many years. As the lights of earth grow dimmer in the distance, and the darkening eye looks forward, to see if it can discern the first glimmer of the heavenly home, the weary pilgrim cries out, even as the child beside its mother, for the Saviour's hand.

O Jesus! Friend and Elder Brother! when the night cometh, when the feet are weary, when the eyes are dim, "Take hold of our hand."

ETERNITY.

ETERNITY! Endless duration, without beginning, without end! Immeasurable as a "sea without a shore"—incomputable as the sand in the bed of the ocean—like boundless space in the universe of God! Eternity! Glorious in the past is the habitation "of the high and lofty one"—glorious in the future is the abode of that "great multitude whom no man can number; and of all nations, and kindreds, and peoples, and tongues, who have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." Would we aspire to be partakers of that blissful eternity, let us continue in the faith, grounded and settled, and not be moved away from the hope of the gospel—the glorious glad tidings that "Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures; and that he was buried, and that he rose from the dead the third day according to the Scriptures."

It has been beautifully expressed, that Eternity has begun with the Christian; if so, present Eternity is ours. But we are still in an enemy's country, have a battle to fight, and a victory to achieve. So let us "put on the whole armor of God," and "fight the good fight of faith, and lay hold on eternal life." "Let us not be weary in well doing," for "he that doeth the will of God abideth for ever"

INFLUENCE OF KINDNESS.

KINDNESS is oftentimes in itself more powerful for the attainment of all our desires, than the utmost stretch of power can be. And this is finely illustrated in the fable of the Sun and the North wind. A contest arose between these two powers, which of them should soonest oblige a countryman to throw off his cloak. Boreas began, and, storming with all his force, tumbled and tossed the cloak about the poor man's ears, but to no purpose; for the stronger he blew, the stronger the clown held, and the closer he wrapt his coat about him. When the wind was weary, the sun began, and played his cheerful beams upon him so successfully, that he soon melted him down into a kindly warmth, that made his cloak not only useless, but troublesome to him, and so he quickly threw it off.

The fable is well known, and the moral of it is obvious; and I would earnestly recommend it to all to remember, that when storming and raging are ineffectual to gain their ends, kindness and good nature will seldom or never fail of success. Indeed, kindness is known to be a specific for many forms of disease, and kind nursing for many more. Christ's whole ministry was one of personal kindness. Charity is the great lever of Christianity; by it the messengers of the Gospel can open the eyes of Pagan kindness—by it the ears of the most obstinate and hardened can be unstopped—by it reason can be restored and life saved.

SELECTIONS.

BEAUTY, as the flowering blossom, soon fades; but the divine excellencies of the mind, like the medicinal virtues of the plant, remain in it when all those charms are withered.

He who is most addicted to reading the inspired Scriptures, has the best assurance that all his other reading will be chosen according to the purest principles of taste and wisdom.

An ignorant minister having remarked in the presence of Dr. South, that the Lord needed no man's learning, that preacher replied, "Still less has he need of man's ignorance."

Avoid the man who says the world owes him a living. The world owes no man a living till he earns it. "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread."

He who hates his neighbour is miserable himself, and makes all around him miserable.

The way to be truly happy is to be good.

A week well filled up with selfishness, and the Sabbath stuffed full of religious exercise, will make a good Pharisee, but a poor Christian. There are many persons who think the Lord's-day is a sponge with which to wipe out the sins of the week.

Although we cannot tell what the future will be, yet, as Jesus has gone to prepare a place, we have no fears as to the extent and quality of the state.

It is no flattery to give a friend a due character, for commendation is as much the duty of a friend as reprehension.

An unjust man is an abomination to the just.

ON THE DEATH OF OUR DEAR ONE

(Given by request.)

SOFT and silent as the shadows
Cast upon the sleeping lake,
Or the sparkling dew on meadows
Which the gentle zephyrs slake,
Lay the angel of her bosom
On the mother's heaving breast:
'Twas the richly-scented blossom—
'Twas the sweetest and the best.

But a silent whisper called her
From the distant land afar;
'Twas the breathings of the Saviour
Wafted on the evening air.
Softly—softly press thy kisses,
Mourner on the lonely shore;
Angels bright, with fond caresses,
Will conduct her safely o'er.

On life's wild, careering ocean,
Swiftly glides her fragile bark;
As the winged arrow's motion,
Or the vivid lightning's spark.
Sleep, thou babe, thy pulse is waning,
Darkness sits upon the wave,
As it waits thy gentle dreaming
To the slumbers of the grave.

Still my faith, outstripping fancy,
Darts away on mystic flight,
And with pinions bathed in glory,
Sweeps the boundless fields of light:
Higher yet—still higher soaring,
Opens the pearly gates on high,
While unnumbered lutes are pouring
Choral anthems through the sky.

Far away on sunny mountains,
Where the stately palm-tree grows,
And the leap of gushing fountains
Wakes the streamlet's soft repose;
There, 'mid angel bands I see her
Vieing with a brilliant throng—
Infants singing "Blessed Saviour!"
While his glory pours along.

LECTURES ON SACRED LITERATURE

DELIVERED TO THE MORNING CLASS OF BETHANY COLLEGE, BY A. CAMPBELL.

BEFORE entering upon the chapter for this morning's lecture, let us say a few words with reference to the four books of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, which are called the Gospels in our technical language. These names were given to them in earlier days, and not by the most intelligent portion of the human race in Christendom. We have only one Gospel, though there are reports of four evangelists so called; but, in fact, two of these four were only apostles. The apostle spoke with respect to, and had his calling lying entirely in the conversion of, that great people, called the Gentiles; or, vulgarly speaking, the nations. It is important to know the scope and intent of these books of the Gospel, as they are the representations of the life and doings of Christ and his primitive apostles. We are to look at and study them in the same light that we would four distinctly different witnesses coming into one of our courts of Oyer and Terminer, to testify in some important case. Each and every one of the witnesses are examined as we should examine the characters of these four writers of the Gospel, through the testimony they bear.

It is utterly impossible, as well as the height of absurdity, for any honest and intelligent man to assume, assert, or prove, that the authors of these four books copied from each other's writings. Among the thousands and millions of human beings that have and do live, there are no two faces just alike; yet, sweeping as the assertion may seem, we do unhesitatingly affirm, that the four Gospels of the New Testament are just as unlike each other in all their distinctive characteristics, as any four faces in the human family. There are remarkable analogies and similitudes in the different races of men, which are indicative of a wonderful power above; and each one of the human family will, to the end of time, always have something characteristic of his own personality. So it is with the evangelists and the apostles: the manner in which they all tell the same interesting story, under different circumstances, at different periods of time, and independent of traditional evidence, must show to the eye of cultivated and enlightened minds, that they are separate and independent records of the same important facts; and hence we say, there is no possible ground for collusion on this most mooted point of the Bible.

Finally, after our remarks upon the different chapters of this book of Matthew, we are brought to this last deposition of Matthew concerning the resurrection, and to the great commission which Christ conferred on his disciples after he had risen from the dead. As we approach the conclusion of the history of the Messiah's life, we experience an accumulating interest, and become more and more anxious to know how it is going to terminate. This, as the sequel shows, was the case with those who lived in the days that these remarkable events transpired.

It is well known to the historian and to those who are versed in sacred history, and profane as well, that the Jews were always very strict in regard to a close observation of the Sabbath, and to this day they are characterized, as a people, by that Pharisaic scrupulosity respecting the Sabbath. The women that had been with Jesus a good deal, and who had witnessed his crucifixion and burial, were very much concerned about his resurrection; hence after patiently conforming to the Jewish laws respecting their day of worship and rest, we find them at the very dawn of the first day of the week hastening to the sepulchre. In consideration of these facts, the lives of Mary Magdalene and the other Mary, who went to see the sepulchre, present them to us as monuments of great courage and heroism, for in those times the extreme obloquy existing in regard to the Saviour's name, in the minds of the greater portion of the people, particularly among the chief priests and elders, rendered it exceedingly dangerous to assume the character that these two persons did. From the relations of these two faithful women to Christ, we learn the beautiful fact, that a good act performed toward or for the Messiah, should never go unrewarded. They diligently and anxiously watched the rich Arimathean sepulchre, in the which Jesus was laid; and when he was risen, they were favoured by the angel sent from heaven, telling them, "Go quickly and tell his disciples that he has risen from the dead." In obeying this command of respect and courtesy to them, they were richly honored by the first appearance of Christ; for as they went to tell the disciples, Jesus met them and greets them with affectionate and respectful terms, saying, "All hail!"—that is, all health and happiness to you. When they had fallen at his feet, and paid their feelings of regard and love to him, he bids them not to be afraid, and commissions the heroines to go and tell his brethren to go to Galilee and there he will meet them. Go, tell my brethren—how courteous that term. He does not say my disciples now, but having become tortured in the blood, and having ended the agonies of death, he calls the disciples brethren. Thus the women received the first great honor of conversing with the messenger sent from heaven to open the tomb of the Saviour, and they also experienced the great joy of first seeing and talking with the Son of God after his resurrection. This was a happy era in their life—everything contributed to render it so. Besides seeing and conversing with Christ, they had been honored by the special visit of a special heavenly messenger, than which, we cannot conceive of anything more beautiful and sublime than his appearance, with his countenance like lightning, and his raiment white as snow. In this chapter, perhaps, we have the most correct and brilliant description given of an angel that is furnished in Holy Writ.

No class of people were more deeply interested in the life, death, and resurrection of Christ, than the Elders, Chief Priests, and Pharisees generally. Consequently, when the news of the resurrection of Jesus came into the city by the watch, while the women were going to deliver their glorious message, the elders and chief priests assembled and took counsel to bribe the soldiers with large sums of money, to say "his disciples came by night and stole him away while they slept." They feloniously bribed the soldiers to tell this barefaced falsehood, that the dead body of Christ was stolen from the sealed sepulchre—that is, with the seal of state—the breaking of which constituted the highest act of criminality in the courts of Jewish authority—and did it while they slept. To look at this deception with the eye of reason, it becomes the weakest transaction imaginable—that of a person witnessing a transaction while asleep. But the whole fraud is just as good and as plausible as any argument we ever heard against Christianity as urged by sceptics. It is miserably bald. This was a desperate stratagem to pacify the public mind, and to give a quietus to the intense public excitement that then existed. We fear the day for this kind of perfidy and deception has not yet fully passed.

When the eleven disciples of Christ saw him in the mountain of Galilee, where he appointed, they worshipped him, but some doubted. A few men have supposed that this was a manifestation of the doubts they had in the works of the Saviour, but what follows necessarily shows that this could not have been the reason. His disciples doubted on that occasion whether it was Christ whom they saw. It was indicative of the great excitement which, of course, would actually take place in their minds under such wonderful demonstrations as they had witnessed and heard of. The question of doubt, then, was simply whether their eyes reported truly in regard to the identity of Christ's person.

At this crisis, while some believed in their hearts, and others doubted with respect to their sight, Jesus speaks to them. The preamble of Christ in announcing this commission, about to be received by the disciples, is very sublimely indicative of the grandeur of his person. He pronounces to his followers the great and glorious fact, that "All power is given unto him in heaven and earth." He names this fact for the purpose of giving authority to the charge which he is about to confide in his apostles, and in pursuance thereof he commissions and commands them to go and preach the gospel unto the nations of the earth.

We have already alluded to the manner in which Christ taught his disciples for about three years and a half—a time nearly equal to our college terms, in the peripatetic school before graduation—by taking them with him whithersoever he went; through Samaria, over hills and through the dales, across the seas and rivers, and over rock and mountain, everywhere making all nature eloquent by his doctrine, which was done by continually drawing beautiful parables and similes—unlike the Greek and Roman parables, which were mere comparisons—from everything that presented itself in the travels of his life.

For this process of developing and training the mind, we have on the part of the disciples, the Greek word matheteuoo, happily comprehending and elucidating the whole matter. It means to make disciples, or in other words, to initiate as by matriculation into the school of elementary and higher principles. The very word disciple itself signifies neither more nor less than one under discipline—one regarded as a learner and follower of some preceptor.

The first commission given to the disciples was to herald, over town and hamlet in the land of Israel, the fact that the Messiah was born; but the last and grand commission was not given until after Christ was dead and risen. This important item we are to bear in mind while we contemplate Christ's appointment to his disciples, commanding them, "Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit."

We shall be prepared to understand the significancy of the word teach, as coming from didaschoo, which means, to teach anything in the range of literature and science, as well as general knowledge. The disciples had been initiated into the school of Christ's doctrine, and after being thoroughly taught in its principles, they were qualified to go forth into the world and teach the nations. While matheteuoo has respect to elementary and initiatory steps into a thing, didaschoo has regard to the development of the principles of a science or document, and to making them stand out boldly in clear light before the mind.

The institution of baptizing or immersing which Christ emphatically commands here is a very singular term, and one that has been travestied by Rome and Greece, until it has almost lost its primitive value and august authority. It is very strange and unfortunate that there should be so much controversy about this word. Its terminology is easily traced and determined from the three Latin words, bapto, baptideo, and baptisma. The word and its import are very simple, and aside from these high and satisfactory definitions of it, by Greek and Roman interpreters, its meaning may with interest and rationality, be illustrated and settled to the mind of any man upon the onomatopoeic principle. And if any one is curious to understand it in this way, let him go with me to the water, and I will take in my hand a rounded handle of a board, say twelve inches in diameter and four feet in length, and I will engage to make the board and water say dip, by striking it with the edge of the board; and by striking the water with the side of it, I will make them say bap; and then by casting a rough stone into the liquid element, I will make it say plunge! In this manner I can produce the sounds bap, dip, and plunge, just as plainly as they can be spoken by man. You sit in the house next to the roof in a rainy day, and you can hear it rain from morning to night. We have an immense number of words that have been introduced into our language from the onomatopoeic figure of speech. The sound of rain, the sound of many waters rolling and babbling along, and the concussions of the lightnings and thunders of the heavens, are themselves symbols of ideas which have, in the customs of men, become incorporated into our language. They were presented in pictures, which finally became words, and in this way we have received much of our language.

Again: from the association of immersion with Christ's commission to the disciples to teach and baptize among the nations, there are many interesting and practical comparisons to be drawn. All acts of subordinate agents and officials, in all parts of the different governments of the world, are instituted and consummated through delegated authority from the leading and principal powers of the government. In our own government, every man acting under its auspices has to show that he has lawful authority to act, and that he performs his duty in the name and approbation of the Commonwealth. This is the case all over the Protestant world; and in the performance of immersion there is something properly indicative of an entering into a new relation with the great Governor of the universe through his authorized agents. It is entering into a kind of a compact, that did not before exist. It is passing out of one state into another, and assuming a new relation to the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.

This process of immersion is of all mysteries or institutions the most sublime and interesting to the mind of man. Look again. A gentleman after long living in a foreign land comes into this country, where our laws are such that the paying of even a large amount could not give him the right of suffrage until he is literally naturalized. He has no right whatever to go to the poll and cast his vote until he is politically born again, until he is regenerated through the relations of the law of naturalization; which law is, or ought to be, exercised more here than in any other country, so long as our fair land continues to be almost threatened with inundation by the present flood of foreign immigration. Under this wise and just system of government, you have, in the first place, on entering a new country where a government is established, with the intention of living there, we say you must first make a positive and absolute renunciation of everything, in a political point of view, of the country in which you were born and bred. Thus by a solemn renunciation of the mother country and government, you repudiate all forms of legal affinity and consanguinity of a political nature, whereupon you become an adopted citizen to a new relation, and under a different confederacy, having all the rights and immunities of a native born citizen. In this manner the wandering pilgrim is born again, and a man is religiously born again as well as politically born again. Therefore we should not think it strange and unreasonable that Jesus, while conversing with Nicodemus, the ruler and master of Israel, might say to him, "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." Thus these become important matters, inasmuch as they are so vital to the constitutional element of the Christian church and Christian profession. By them we can see and understand how a person becomes ex facto religiously as well as politically naturalized.

In returning from this episode to our text, we remark that there is an erroneous opinion entertained by many persons in regard to the word in, the true meaning and relations of which are so palpable, that we are almost ashamed to allude to it. Almost all nations of the earth baptize in the name of the Father, &c. Now, this is truly and rationally rendered baptize into the name of the Father, by the authority of Christ. The Greek word en is always indicative of rest and passivity, while eis signifies motion and activity. No one with any pretensions to education, would indulge in the solecism by saying, Go into the house. A man gets into a bed before he can sleep in it. Hence we have the whole matter legitimately given. Baptize eis to onomata, into the name, and not en to onomati, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit—not Ghost.

Concerning the word Spirit, let us add, in conclusion, that there is not a single syllable, from the Book of Genesis to the last word of Revelation, to show that the Spirit had any authority. It was the Father of divinity, and not the Spirit, which had the authority. It disposes of the whole affair when we say, that the Holy Spirit is introduced as an agent of authority. It is always to be regarded in this light—as a messenger. The Saviour said he would send the Spirit after he went away from earth to heaven, as a messenger or mediator that could conduct matters better than his followers. The Spirit, as an agent, was to come and to act on the same principle or philosophy that a second or third person is better prepared to adjust difficulties for litigious parties than they are themselves; therefore the Saviour sent the Spirit to be instrumental in restraining the world from wrong, and to break down the demoralizing power of Pagandom.

LOVE TO GOD.

We can love nothing which we can neither know nor apprehend. We cannot love the unknown. Hence the almighty and invisible Father, when he would win our love, reveals himself. This revelation is made through his Son, who was "God manifest in the flesh." Immanuel—"God with us"—is his crowning birth-title. In the heights of the heavens, in the majesty of his glory, God cannot be seen by human eye. There his perfections and beauties are veiled from all human vision. "No man hath seen God at any time," says the lovely John, "the only begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him." The Son himself says, "No man knoweth the Father but the Son, and he to whom the Son shall reveal him." God is not revealed, manifested in the Spirit, nor in angelic nature, nor in the divine nature—but in the flesh—in the human nature. "The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us." Here we behold his glory, full of favour and truth.

From the hour in which John his forerunner closed his mission, Jesus has been the great Revelator for our race. In the last days—after the ancient prophets had closed the testimony concerning him—God has spoken to us by his Son. The Son indeed speaks by the apostles ; but the Father by the Son. He gave to the apostles only the things which the Father gave him. The last book of the New Testament is the “Revelation of Jesus Christ,” signified to John the apostle. How competent was he to make a revelation ! How well did he understand our wants, and what was necessary to prepare us for a higher existence ! He was acquainted with God, and acquainted with man ; acquainted with heaven, and acquainted with earth. For he was God and he was man : he had dwelt in heaven, and he dwelt on earth. He once spake to Nicodemus about the birth into his kingdom ; and though it was something which should, in multiplied instances, transpire on the earth, Nicodemus marvelled. The Saviour says, “If I have told you earthly things, and ye believe not, how shall ye believe if I tell you heavenly things ?” And then he declares his qualifications to reveal even the affairs of heaven, in these words : “No man hath ascended up to heaven but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of Man who is in heaven.” Who would ask for a revelation after the revelation of Jesus ? Who qualified like him ?

In order to love Jesus, we are not to draw upon our imaginings as to what he was before he descended to earth, or to what he is since he ascended from our earth. We are to love him for what he was while he dwelt among us. Our faith centres in him here, and our affections are drawn out to the man Christ Jesus, married to our nature and bound to us by so many endearing ties. Angels may gaze upon him now, and love and praise him for what he is—the glorified King over all ; but men must look upon him in the earth-sphere. They must see the divine manifestation—where alone they can see it to perfection—in a human form, amid temptation, poverty, suffering, and death. They must see it in his obedience in the Jordan—in his sufferings on the mount of temptation—in his continuous labors, all devoted to the good of others : caring for the poor—relieving the distressed—receiving the outcasts—comforting the mourning—healing the maladies of the incurable—and raising the dead. They must behold him weeping, groaning, praying—devoting whole nights in prayer. They must see how unselfish, how benevolent were all he did. He left the heavens where he was rich, and became poor for our sakes. He wore the scarlet robe, the cruel thorns, and bore the cross for our sakes. He endured the scourging, suffered beyond all human computation the agonies of the cross, and died for our sakes. “Good will toward men” shone out of his every act, and tear, and prayer. From the cradle to the grave, let us follow our Immanuel, for he is not now afar off ; he has come down where we can behold him, and here we may learn the best, the sweetest, the most enrapturing and soul-elevating of all lessons—how to love God ! “We love him, because he first loved us, and manifested his love toward us.”

Love is the admiration of the beautiful. In Jesus, the beauties of our God, his excellences appear. They come down to earth in a person, that we may see them, admire, and love. The Jew could not know God as does the Christian ; nor could he love him as the Christian. He had heard that God was love ; but of its extent he was ignorant till Jesus came. He had read that God was pitiful ; but little did he know of that pity till Jesus exemplified it. He had read of the mercy of God ; but that mercy was veiled in mystery till Jesus died for our sins. Every declared attribute sounded upon his ear ; but could not enter the deeper recesses of his heart. The Christian alone can know, fully know, the true God, by knowing Jesus whom he sent.

The fulness of the Deity was in Jesus, and shone forth from him. He was all innocence—fair in his innocence—lovely in his innocence. Innocency was not his only virtue. All active virtues were his. His character stands out in fairest proportions, perfect in all its parts. In him were justice, goodness, love, pity, mercy, condescension—every grace to perfection. There is enough in him who reveals the Father, to study, admire, and love for ever. To see him is to love him. That spirit, all meekness, condescension, and a very fount of love, pity, and melting tenderness, is too lovely not to win love again. So immeasurably grand is his character, that, gazing upon it from every point of view, it presents increasing attractions, and new reasons for loving and praising him.

There is a power in this love more than is found in aught beside. For he whose heart has learned to love him aspires to his excellence: he wishes to draw near him, to be changed into that image: he would flee away from his sins to climb upward to the pure plain of innocence and virtue where walked our Redeemer. Companionship with Jesus will mould the character for heaven. Our earthly companions do much in forming our characters. True it is that "Evil communications corrupt good manners," and equally true that loving the good of earth inclines us to virtue's ways. But to love Jesus, and to have his society—yes, his society; for we can have it—is to make us God-like, partakers of the divine nature. There is no power enabling us to subdue pride, endure temptation, bear affliction, suffer evil without resistance, root out of the heart every unhallowed passion—anger, malice, envy, selfishness, covetousness; in short, enabling us to overcome this evil world, but the love of God shed abroad in our hearts. With this love in the heart there is a peace, passing all understanding, and a heavenly calm, superior to all the turmoils of a sinful world. Nor time, nor affliction, nor persecution, nor temptation, nor aught of the inventive cruelty of men or devils can obliterate it. It grows stronger and sweeter under every trial, and mocks at fear under the most cruel tortures. No dark cloud hovers over the death-passage when love is present; but rays of holy light beam down from the upper sanctuary, and there is no gloom nor loneliness: the love-smile shows upon the pallid lips; for faith has heard a sweet voice say—"I will be with thee!" A. C.—N.

WILL MY EDUCATION EVER BE FINISHED ?*

EDUCATION is one of the themes that is now most discussed. The poor man strives to give his children an education, and it is the same with the rich. The poor man takes his children from the plough—from being hewers of wood and drawers of water—sends them to study books, and thinks they are becoming educated. The improvement derived from taking care of horses, cows, sheep, hogs, and poultry—from learning the business of the farm, is not so important. He thinks that it is not education. They must study books—fill their minds with the ideas contained in them, and this gives them the qualifications desired. It seems to be the common idea that girls, as well as boys, must go through books for several years, and at the end of the time they will be educated.

It is not agreed on by all, what course is best. The learned differ in their opinions. It is the settled conviction of many persons, that when the ancient languages are patiently studied—patiently turned and trenched, they form the loam that best fertilizes the mind of man. Others believe that mathematics only trains and develops the intellect as it should be. Mr. N. P. Willis was in France some years ago, and concluded, when standing in a crowd of Frenchmen who were chattering and jabbering like magpies, that a knowledge of the French language was the only true education; and with that impression bearing upon his mind, he advised his countrymen and women to study that tongue very earnestly. He told them that verbs and exercises were tiresome, but if they persevered, they would find their use, should they ever visit the land of the fast-talking Frenchman. Girls often say, "When my education is completed I will do so and so." Most of us think that a time will come when we shall have acquired such an amount of knowledge that we will be able to lay aside books, and be educated men and women. Many think so, who know nothing that renders them agreeable and pleasant, who can do but little for themselves or others. They have studied books—have been at school, and their friends, and they themselves, think they must be educated. Is it not possible for persons to go through volume after volume, and then not be educated in the true sense of the word? The word education comes from a Latin verb, which signifies to lead forth, to draw out, to train. If this is the case when we speak of persons being truly educated, we should mean that all the powers of mind and body have been led forth—have been drawn out. Will merely going through books have this effect? It will certainly lead forth some of the faculties, but will cause others to lie dormant. Indeed, this constant poring over books disqualifies many for all physical exertion, and without this, the body becomes feeble and enervated. The mind sympathizes with the body, and both are incapable of having their powers drawn out, led forth, trained. Is it the office of education to fill the mind with knowledge, facts, and information, as a cistern is filled with water brought in buckets from another fountain, or is it the opening up of its own fountains? Are there not, as it were, hidden fountains that may be traced to their sources—that may have all obstructions removed, and be led to fertilize and beautify, to make streams burst forth in the deserts, and the desert rejoice and blossom as the rose? Is education, as I asked before, a filling up of the mind, or is it a drawing forth from within? Is it not a bringing into exercise all the powers of mind and body? Cannot the body be educated as well as the mind? May it not become feeble, inactive, ungainly, unmannerly, unhandsome, for want of having its capacities led forth by a genial influence: or may it not become strong, active, graceful, easy, and beautiful, by such training as will call forth all its powers, and awaken all its energies? Persons may be instructed without being truly educated. They may have their minds full of knowledge from books, and still have but little knowledge of the faculties that are needed every day for the common purposes of life. Remarkable examples might be given; but I will only mention one. Neander is known as a man whose head was filled with the love of books. He was a professor in a college in Germany, was a church historian, was revered for his great learning and many able qualities, but in common affairs was a very child. He could not walk the streets of his own city without losing his way. His sister, a plain, common-sense woman, who thought like Solomon, that "much study was a weariness to the flesh," had to lead him about. Without her guidance, there is no knowing where his philosophical abstractions would have carried him. It might be a matter of discussion which of the two was the better educated. The study of books alone does not bring forth those qualities which render men and women gentle, good, and pure. It does not bring out all those sweet emotions and lovely dispositions which make earth a paradise. Edgar Poe had studied books; his intellect had been filled with the beautiful thoughts of the ancients and moderns, but his heart—his moral powers had not been cultivated. He let his gentle wife die of starvation while he was indulging in the most maddening dissipation. He went to the house of a lady he expected to call his second wife, and committed such outrages that it was necessary to summon the police. The Editor of the Edinburgh Review says, "He imagines that the lowest abyss of moral imbecility and dissipation had not been reached until Edgar Poe came." This man's intellect had been filled with the knowledge of books, and had been led forth to produce poems that all must admire. I think no one can read his "Raven" without pleasure, or hear him talk of the "Tintinabulation of his Bells" without almost fancying that he hears it.

I have given examples of persons whom I have called instructed but not educated. I cannot refrain from saying something of a man whom I think must have had all his powers of mind and body "drawn forth"—must have been truly educated. His name was Arnold. He was master of a large school at Rugby. In his course of education, "the fear of God was the beginning of wisdom." He next inculcated gentlemanly conduct, and lastly, intellectual ability. It was not so much his effort to instruct as to draw forth. He tried to awaken the intellect, and thought that the main movement must come from within the pupil, and not from without. He thought that all should be done by him, and not for him. He preached to his boys on Lord's-day, and laboured with them during the week.

One of his pupils says of his preaching, "His voice was as soft as the notes of a flute, and as stirring as the call of a bugle." It was not the cold, clear voice of one out of danger, giving advice to those who were sinning and struggling below, but the warm, living voice of one who was fighting for us, and by our sides, and calling us to keep to him and to one another. This pupil visited the school after Dr. Arnold's death. He took the seat in the chapel he had occupied years before. His heart was full of the memories of his school life and his teacher. He would have given treasures to see him for five minutes, to tell him how he loved and revered him, and how, by God's help, he would follow his steps in life and in death. His system had an influence on the schools of England that has not been lost. The spirit of the educated survives the grave, and though dead, still lives, speaks, and inspires. He died in 1841, and left hundreds whom he had taught to believe in himself and his Maker to mourn him. I think such a man must have been truly educated, and conclude that a person is so when he has all his capacities for usefulness and goodness developed. He is not educated if he has the genius of Milton, the power of Locke, the poesy of Burns, the easy flowing style of Goldsmith, or even the pompous elegance of Johnson, unless his mental gifts are graced by the will and power of doing good—unless his moral powers have been led forth on missions of peace and love to his fellow-beings.

I might speak of physical education, as it is first and most important of all. Without this, persons who devote themselves to books lose their energy, and the lamp goes out just when they think they have well trimmed it to give light to those around. In ancient times the body was educated if the mind was not. The young engaged in active sports that led forth all their powers. They ran races, boxed, wrestled, leaped, and jumped in every direction. They began early, and this training was continued till mature age. Everything was included that could render them capable of bearing fatigue and hardships. The young man who was most expert and active, had a light wreath placed on his brow, which was done amidst the acclamations of thousands, and he was afterwards held in the highest esteem by his countrymen.

In England, I have been told that students engage in some sports of ancient. English boys are taught to box, and in case of difficulties they use their fists, instead of pistols and bowie knives. They often walk ten or twelve miles, and deem it a light journey. The English ladies, too, walk a great deal, and take the children with them. The German student throws a wallet over his shoulder, and with his flute or violin to amuse himself and the natives, wanders over hill and valley studying Geography, Botany, and other branches of Natural Science to be learned in the woods. A writer upon the subject says: "In America, the student bends himself over his books with his feet perhaps on the mantle-piece. He studies a little and nods a little. When too far overcome by the gentle influence distilling over him, he owns himself conquered, and takes a good long nap, with the hope of feeling better when he awakes. A hearty dinner comes next, and he has to nap again. The time spent in napping and nodding is made up of many precious hours. He not only loses this, but his energies are enfeebled, and many have but little capacity for the usefulness necessary in the active scenes of life. There are, of course, exceptions to general rules. I would ask if it is ever proper to say, "My education is completed?" Can it be possible for a girl fifteen or sixteen years old to say truthfully, "I have finished my education?" If she has studied at school for a few years, can she imagine that her powers of mind have been developed, and that there is no more need of exertion? Miss Edgeworth, in one of her tales, speaks of an old lady who always visited Miss Rosamond after she went home in vacation, to inquire when her education would be done with. Miss Rosamond's mother was not of the opinion that it could ever be finished, and always answered, "Never while she lives." I suppose, of course, that it was the idea of the writer, as she made her own education the business of life. Persons of experience say that a long life may be spent in educating one's self, and even then, perfection is not attained.

Newton, when an old man, said that he felt as "a child who had only been playing with pebbles on the shore of the great ocean of truth." If such a man felt he had done but little, how should the most of persons feel? Is there any room for being vain of the small amount of knowledge that can be acquired in youth? I think not; and I have heard it remarked that when persons assume such an account of superior advantages, it shows great want of proper training. In reading the life of Dr. Johnson, one is struck with his humility. He was considered the first scholar of England, and yet he spoke of his deficiencies—of his want of accuracy. When we reflect upon what we learn and what we do, we should know enough to make us humble. We would certainly feel so if we could compare the knowledge attained by ourselves with that which has been acquired by others, and with that which we may still make our own. Mrs. Virginia L. French, writing for the Southern Homestead, ridicules the idea of a girl "finishing her education," and says she will never send her daughters to a school where it is pretended that girls are "finished off." She thinks that ease, grace, elegance, true education, must come from all the associations of life that call forth all the powers, and lead them into active exertion.

I do not perhaps give her words, but her ideas. Books, I think, form only a small part of our education. All the events of life assist in it. The sweet and lovely things of earth, the buds and blossoms, the soft showers of Spring, and its dewy freshness. The influences of loving friends—of the Christian religion—the blessings that surround us—train, educate, and form our characters. Then there are the clouds and the storms, the dark days and the sad ones, the sorrows and the sufferings, to teach the soul and lead it forth to trust in God, and to act for the good of the world. In the words of a good writer, "The infant eye has its master in the Sun. The ear is attuned by the melodies and harmonies of the wide and boundless creation. The goings on of the heavens and the earth are the courses of lessons. The shows that are painted on the dome of the sky, and on the uplifted mountains, on the spreading plains and seas, are its pictured diagrams—immensity, infinity, eternity are its teachers." But go back. If education consists in filling the mind with knowledge—in drawing out all its powers for usefulness and goodness, can a young person say, "I have finished my education?" I think if we have proper views, we will consider that at school we have only laid a foundation on which to build in future life. Our teachers do not consider us educated. They advise us to go on and never be weary. Their counsel is, that we should make constant effort to continue our education, not only by gaining knowledge, but also by such a course of conduct in the duties of life as will develop our moral powers and increase our physical ability. There will always be something to do that will assist in the development of our faculties—something that will call forth energies of which we ourselves have not, perhaps, been conscious until the necessity came, which made the performance of duty necessary.

We never expect to speak of "having finished—of being educated." There will always be something to learn. There will be powers of mind and body that may be improved and led forth to greater perfection. There, too, are all the graces of the Christian character that we may make our own. This cannot be done at once. It takes long to acquire the elegance and grace arising from the full possession of a meek and quiet spirit. We have to toil for what is useful and good. Labour is the price of all that is worth possessing. God has given it as the principal educator, as the means of leading forth the principal powers, and I might say moral and intellectual. Without mental labour persons will never become intellectual. Without moral labour the affections will not be led forth to make life sweet by all the kind and gentle actions that flow from them. Labour gives to the cup of existence all its zest—all its relish. It cannot be called a curse. The thorns and thistles of earth have been greater blessings than all the flowers of Eden. Poverty and affliction may be numbered among these. The powers of man have been tempered to iron hardness by their sharp admonitions. They have called forth his energies and resources—have taught him to know himself, to help his neighbour, and to look to his God for help when he needs it. His strength has sprung up stronger and fresher under the clouds of trial and suffering. His soul has been braced and his body made firm by the keen cold winds of adversity. Out of darkness cometh light, and from the cold frosts and bitter snows have bloomed all the beautiful flowers of Spring.

PASSING THOUGHTS.

WEALTH, admiration, and fame never cost me many thoughts, for I know that they are vanities and vexations, and would afford little comfort in the hour of death. But I do think it would be sweet, noble to win others to holiness; that the crown which our Father will one day bestow may be set with a few more stars brighter and lovelier than earth's richest diadema. And if by our walk and labour for others, we could turn one soul to God before our bodies are laid low, the consciousness of this would afford deepest consolation. And if the Christian friends who contribute to the support of the God-devoted and soul-seeking Evangelist, could frame their many deep thoughts, sublime and holy, into sentences—could unfold or bring to light their disappointments and determinations—their heart-felt sorrows and joys—you might fill pages and volumes with noble sentiments and wholesome truths; and these, in their world-wide circulation, might chance to meet the eye of those whose hearts have long since ceased to echo to the music of purified spirits, or to the truth of the Bible. And though the strains would, in themselves, be quite simple, they might touch chords in these neglected and long-silent hearts that would vibrate back again pure emotions of love. Thus the expression of these soul-feelings might give consolation to suffering souls, and incite to noble efforts and deeds of love. And these poor souls would—as Longfellow beautifully expresses it—"Take heart again."

We would seek for love and cherish it—not that quantity which the world pursues, seeking no higher—but that love which is made known in Repentance, Mercy, Truth, Forgiveness, Humility, Prayer, Faith, and Hope—in godly deportment. Love for God, for heaven, for the aged pilgrim, tottering on the brink of the grave, for all disciples of Christ, and for the friendless orphan—this is the love which we should cherish. Such love as this has its ministries, is fraught with gentle blessings, and blooms as a flower to restore more than youth's delights when youth has fled. And it is "Something sterling that will stay,

When gold and silver fly away."

BAPTISM FOR REMISSION.]

THE design of Christian baptism is expressed in the simplest language, to wit: "Repent, and be baptized every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins." The phrase

"for the remission of sins" is an inspired definition of the design of the ordinance; and settles the question with every man who is a practical believer in the divine inspiration of the Holy Scriptures. We are compelled to accept the definition and apply it to baptism, or to reject it, and interpolate one of our own.

When the inspired apostle gives us a definition of faith — that it “is confidence, as it respects things hoped for—conviction, as it respects things not seen”—we regard it as final, and apply the definition to the term faith wherever we find it in the sacred writings. So also of the other—baptism. The Spirit of God affirms that baptism is for the remission of sins; and we accept the definition with as little murmuring and suspicion as we do that of faith—for both rest upon the same authority.

This is quite an elementary matter. The Scriptures must define their own terms and ordinances, or they are simply unintelligible to man. Human reason has no place here but to hearken and receive the simple statement or enunciation of the truth. The oracle defining the design of baptism is before the eyes of the world, expressed in language so simple and easy of apprehension as to force itself into the understanding. There is no place for exposition, interpretation, or learned comment; for no living man, nor even an inspired man, can speak or write in a plainer style than is employed in this instance. If a man blunder here, there is no apology for him; since he cannot blunder but by an act of unbelief. The sense of the definition rests on the certainty of child-like language. “Be baptized for the remission of sins:” if doubt or difficulty attaches to these words—then doubt spreads itself over the entire Revelation of God—over language as an instrument of thought. The result would force us into universal scepticism!

Among the many shining, sunlike aphorisms of the Bible, there is not one more perfectly transparent than the definition before us — be baptized for the remission of sins. The proposition, that there is but one God, is no plainer. The precept, Thou shalt not steal; or, Thou shalt not commit adultery—is no more intuitively certain. Learned exposition touching the language of the precept—Thou shalt not commit adultery, is as much required as it is touching the meaning of the phrase, “for the remission of sins.” If professed Christians choose to raise a fog over these simple intuitive words, and in their expositions lay down principles which lead to universal scepticism, it is to their own shame. We prefer to reverence God and common-sense more than to engage in such disgraceful work.

It is said that the same language (Acts ii. 38) is never employed again in the New Testament Scriptures, and this fact is brought against our position—against the truth of Peter's words. That the same identical words are never employed again, makes the case all the stronger. It clearly shows that the language in question is really the definition of the design of the ordinance. It gives the reason why a man should be baptized — the end for which he performs the act. It was, therefore, unnecessary to repeat, in strict form, the definition any more. An allusion is sufficient after this work of fundamental exposition—as, “Arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins.” Wherever a baptism is recorded, after the day of Pentecost, the purpose of the act—remission of sins — is implied, being preceded by the unmistakable definition uttered by the Spirit of the living God. There is but one definition of faith in the Christian Scriptures (Heb. xi. 1. Who will reject it because it is not repeated again, in the same identical words? The design of baptism is once given; and this definition is sufficient for every one who does not wish to interlope his own will and philosophy into the oracles of God. But the substance of the definition is repeated and implied in many passages; so that those who reject the design of baptism, as given by Peter, because the same language is not employed again, are self-condemned in the rejection of the same truth substantially uttered in many forms.

The sects reproach us for holding that baptism is for the remission of sins. They reproach the Holy Scripture as much as they do us. They might as well stigmatize us for holding that the Bible is an inspired volume, that God has been manifest in the flesh—that there will be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and the unjust. They might as well shame us for holding that murder and adultery are forbidden in the Bible. There is a perversity in the conduct of the sects towards us on this point, that defines description! The demon of sectarianism shows its giant and terrible form, just here is:—

“With head uplift above the wave, and eyes
That sparkling blazed, his other parts besides

Prone on the flood, extended long and large,
Lay floating many a rood.”

And why do they stigmatize us? For accepting and teaching the definition of the design of Christian baptism, in the precise words of the Holy Spirit! This is the head and front of our offending: no more. They reject this inspired definition. Here is the issue.

The sects accuse us of making a “saviour of baptism.” This is mean. Tom Paine said that the New Testament required a man to believe that the living God committed debauchery with a woman. There is as much piety and reason in Paine’s blasphemy, as there is in the charge of “baptismal regeneration” preferred against us. If a man deny that Jesus is the Messiah, we all say he is an unbeliever, and that he gives God the lie. But if a man deny that baptism is for the remission of sins, he is honeyed all over by the sects, as orthodox and evangelical! Yet there is as much unbelief in this last as in the first. It gives God the lie to the entire extent of denying the Messiahship.

Again, the sects complain that we preach baptism continually. Having rejected the design of baptism, they do not wish to hear of it. It is a prickly pear in their consciences. But they might as well complain that we preach faith and repentance continually. We preach all three continually, to sinners. We have as much authority to preach baptism as they have to preach faith and repentance. The Apostolic commission is the basis of all true preaching. Take this away, and no one has the right to preach anything. Baptism is in that commission, is authorized by it, and made obligatory to the same extent as faith and repentance. The suppression of one term of the commission, is a corruption of the whole instrument. To offer remission of sins on faith alone, or on faith and repentance, to the exclusion of baptism, is an apocryphal gospel. There is no more authority for such a gospel than there is for Platonism or the infallibility of the Pope.

It can only work ruin and disaster. Unbelief, disobedience, rejection of God’s Word, and the substitution of human policies and expediences, in place of the divine plan and justification, as naturally grow out of this pseudo-gospel as the tender bud grows out of the twig in the Spring of the year.

Again, they tell us we are uncharitable. This is a confession of sin. “Who has hindered you that you have not obeyed the truth?” Who has compelled the sects to mutilate the commission, to reject baptism “for the remission of sins”—to invent a new system of getting pardon, unknown to the Scriptures? Who has forced them to embrace and preach an apocryphal Christianity?—to exchange the apostolic practice for one of purely human origin and authority? They have done these things of their own choice, and if the Word of God bears hard upon them—if the sword of the Spirit wounds them fatally, there is no uncharitableness in us. We had as soon preach the “mourning bench system” as the apostolic commission, if it were a part of the divine commandments. But it is not known to the Bible: it is purely a human expediency and fleshy policy. We dare not touch it. The Word of God makes no provision for errorists. We can make none.

It is a great privilege to suffer shame and reproach for Christ. It lifts a man above himself—above the world, with its treasures and fame—above the midnight throne of stars, and associates him with the elect spirits and martyrs, whose pathway on earth was sprinkled with their tears and blood! It gives to the soul a dauntless courage—a heroism in the presence of danger—a lofty contempt of pain and suffering, which glorify a Christian, and make him appear in the midst of his persecutions like an angel standing in the temple of light! It is better to stand upon the Word of God—upon the simple faith and practice of the Apostles, and be disgraced in the eyes of all the earth, than to be enthroned in earthly fame by embracing a corrupted form of Christianity. The authority of the Bible is before popular plaudits. I rejoice that the sects have left deeply scored in their vile abuse of us the unmistakable proofs of their own unbelief and rejection of the Word of God. Let them proceed.

Men may disgrace the truth, but the truth will not disgrace them. Men can no more kill the gospel than they can drag Messiah from his throne and murder him again. The onward progress of the truth will sweep from the earth every refuge of lies, and crush to the dust every missionary of the Arch-apostate. He was a liar from the beginning, because he did not abide in the truth. He departed from the truth, and fell day and night

"Nine times the space which measures
To mortal men."

Let others fear. God has not deserted his own Book—nor will he suffer his own definition of the design of baptism to lie under the reproaches of sectarianism for ever! God will bring up this truth from the night of the Apostasy, and make it shine like a sea of glass mingled with fire. Let us, then, be faithful to the gospel. We are glorified by the persecutions through which we have passed. Our reproach is the reproach of the Master. I had rather bear it than be crowned with orthodoxy and fill the proudest pulpit in the sectarian world. The day of Pentecost is our foundation. Here is the glory and the power of God.

"Believing, we rejoice."

THE SPIRIT'S OPERATION.

PERMIT me to call the attention of our brethren to one thing, which now occupies a large share of their time, to wit, what is called the "operation of the Spirit through the word." I wish simply to inquire where I shall find this phrase or idea in the Sacred Volume. God and his Word are one and inseparable, and what he has joined together, let no man separate—what the Spirit of God does, the Word does; and what the Word does, the Spirit does. I know nothing that the Spirit does only as he says or speaks to me in intelligible words (1 Cor. xiv. When I was summoned by the church to show how the Holy Spirit operated in the sinner's heart to change it, I took these positions: that God spoke to all men who had the Book in that book. "Unto you, O man, I call, and my voice is to the sons of men," Pro. i.; that men have eyes to read that word, and ears to hear God speak to them, and have reason and hearts to believe God; and that if God gives to one sinner the aid or help to the amount of the point of the finest cambric needle to enable him to believe, and withholds the amount from other sinners, without which they cannot believe God, and without which aid the word of God is of no use to such sinners—we had as well be without his word till that amount come to us, and that we had as well go the whole hog, as we said in another place, and state that the Spirit regenerated him without the word; and on this hypothesis, the Bible was useless as a fifth wheel to a vehicle in the conversion and sanctification of sinners. I am at this point yet. Paul, the Apostle, one of the ancient captains of our faith, says, "For this cause also thank we God without ceasing, because when you received the word which you heard of us, you received it not as the word of men, but as it is in the truth, the word of God, which effectually works also in you that believe." What are the facts in this case? 1. We give thanks to God without ceasing. 2. Because they received or believed God's Word, not as the word of men, but as the Word of God. This word of God believed, worked effectually. This something that is now overperadded, 'is it given to the word? What for? When given, will it do more than to work effectually or powerfully in the conversion, faith, and salvation of the sinner? If not, why is it given? It can do no more than produce faith and obedience. These are produced by the Word believed. Why, then, give this something to do that which the Word does without it? Does God do supernumerary or unnecessary things? If the sinner were to receive one hundred operations, they could do no more than to work in him effectually to believe and be saved. This one passage forever nullifies a thousand such dreams. What power there is in the proclamations of kings, emperors, rulers and presidents, governors and judges, to produce war and death! How effectually does the word of even a private individual work in another person, when he says to him, "You lie! you are a rogue! you are a murderer," &c. Do not these words produce deaths, duels, wars? Is God's Word less powerful than man's, that he must add to it before it is worthy of universal acceptance? What tremendous and extraordinary effects have been produced by the ancient and modern orators! Has not one speech wrought the life or death of thousands and millions of our race? Must God give security for what he says? Does this dream that is now so much wanted operate on the sinner before faith to produce faith, without which he can no more believe than he can make a world? Did not Adam believe the devil without this something? Yes, he did. Is the devil more worthy of belief than God? No. Is the Bible true? Yes. Is it wrong to believe the truth? Is it wrong to believe God? No. Do we not believe all the false religions in the world? Yes. Does the Spirit of God aid us to believe lies? No. Do not some persons believe nearly all lies? Yes. Can we not believe God easier than we can the father of all liars? He that believes not the record that God has given of his Son, has attempted to make God a liar, which is the greatest sin we can be guilty of, and for which we are to be damned. "He that believeth not shall be damned" (Mark xvi.) No man is so wicked that he cannot believe. The demons believe. Wicked men believe what they choose to believe. Our Saviour said the fourth class of hearers received the seed, or word, into good and honest hearts. How many of the popular preachers believe that some persons by nature have good and honest hearts? If any of our junior brethren have more light than I have on this subject, let us have it. If they have any revelation from heaven since John wrote his Amen, let us know what it is. We do not want any voices, visions, dreams, higher laws, inner lights—nor what my father's old Tom used to call "Jack-me-lanterns"—nor lightning bugs, nor meteors, nor mediums, nor mutterers, nor peepers, nor diviners, nor fortune-tellers; but we want to know what this operation is without the Word, before faith—this personal, immediate, direct, and almost miraculous operation which every convert receives to enable him to believe, separate and distinct from above the Word. I ask for chapter and verse. I freely confess that where God's Word fails to enlighten and instruct me on spiritual and divine matters, I am in the dark. I have not had any revelations, nor additional light, above that Word. The voice of the Lord is powerful. With this Word, or hammer, he breaks nations, cities, and communities to pieces. The Lord is in his holy temple. Let all the earth keep silence before him.

"HE KNOWETH NOT HOW."

THIS text informs us that when we sow a seed in the ground it grows up in a manner entirely unknown to us. We know not how it grows. Another Scripture says, "God causes to grow," but how he "giveth the increase" he has not informed us. This "how" is a great mystery, beyond the reach of human knowledge. Whether God operates directly or indirectly, in the production of a vegetable from the seed, is a question as far beyond our powers to resolve as it is unnecessary for us to know. As this vegetable growth is the divinely authorized explanation of spiritual growth, it would be well for us all to see how far the illustration will carry us to the decision of the spiritual question involved.

And here I have a question to propose for solution by either of the parties who have been contending about how the Spirit operates. As the whole controversy turns upon this one hinge, I hope some one who "knoweth" will give us a little light. I have never as yet been able to commit myself fully to the "direct" nor to the "indirect" doctrine of spiritual influences in conversion, for I am not one that "knoweth how." But I here state, that I will adopt the theory of either party if a satisfactory answer can be given to my question commanding my judgment to said party. Moreover, I will preach and forward such view with a devotion just in the ratio of its importance to the conversion of the world, as soon as some one will show me what to preach.

The query I would propose, then, is simply this: Has God laid up in the system of nature—in the influence of the sun, rain, soil, air, &c.—all the powers necessary for the growth of vegetation, or is it necessary for him to add to all these influences an immediate, “direct” energy to “cause it to grow?”

Read it over again, if you please, for this is the point upon which the whole controversy turns. “Paul may plant and Apollos water, but God causes to grow.” How? Has God lodged all the power necessary to conversion in the system of Christianity—in the simple planting of the good seed of the kingdom in the good soil of an honest heart—or does he add to all these his own direct spiritual agency to convert the sinner? This latter question will be of very easy solution when once the question that I have italicized shall have been fairly answered. I hope I am understood. If God has anywhere in his word or works told us how he operates in “giving the increase” among the vegetables, whether it is by “direct” or “indirect” means, or by both, we ought to learn what he has said, for this instruction would strongly intimate to us that we ought to understand the same principle as it is involved in theology. And if he has never been at any pains to explain his manner of working in nature, it would seem that he is quite indifferent whether we understand how he operates in spiritual things. As the former explains the latter, it is plain that he did not intend us to go beyond the explanation, nor to fall short of it. Whoever “knoweth how” in the former case, “knoweth how” in the latter. I know not: who will instruct me?

I do not wish to be understood as having no settled convictions myself touching these questions. On the contrary I am, and have, for years, been well convinced that both sides of the issue involve alike untaught and speculative theories, of the truth of which both parties are alike ignorant. Even if metaphysicians could cipher out the truth in the case, the common mind never could, and this alone is sufficient to stamp it as inapplicable and profitless to the masses, for whom the gospel was designed.

I have never yet heard one Scripture quoted to prove the “direct” influences of the Spirit, which might not be fairly enough understood as an influence exerted through the word; nor have I ever heard one argument for the word alone theory, or that theory which goes to prove that all influences upon the sinner are exerted through the word alone, that covered half the ground necessary for a logical proof. I have, indeed, no more fellowship with the one theory than with the other, for when neither of them is pushed forward as a term of fellowship, they are alike schismatical. (To say that God has no other means in the universe to bring to bear upon sinners except his word alone, is one of those universal negatives that never can be proved.) God may have a million ways of influencing men to do right, that we have never heard of; yet we cannot prove that he has ever used any more of them for the conversion of the world, than those committed to us. If we plant and water, God will surely “give the increase.” This result he may effect in any way it seemeth good to him: I have no concern about it. He may send his Spirit, or his word, or both, in the hearts of all sinners every day in the year if that seems best to him. We should have no quarrel over it, for the sown grain springs up we “know not how.”

T. M.

CONVERSION.

THERE is nothing of an essentially religious character about this word. It simply means to turn, with the intention of proceeding in the direction towards which the person has turned. It is used to express a relapse into error as well as turning from error to truth, as in Gal. iv. 9, “But now after you have known God; or, rather, are known by God, how turn ye again to the beggarly elements of the world, whereunto ye desire again to be in bondage.” And in 2 Peter ii. 22, The dog has turned to his own again.

The sacred writers, however, have used it to express a change in the religious views and practices of men—a turning from the worship of idols to that of the true God ; or, indeed, from any human system of religious thought or procedure, to that revealed from heaven. Like repentance, it has its origin in the mind, and its developement in conduct. It must not be confounded with repentance, but must be recognized as co-existent with it during the life of man. Because, to speak of a man as thoroughly repented, you must speak of him as thoroughly reformed and purified in life and spirit ; else you must simply regard him as actuated by such a changed disposition as will ultimately result in this. So, to speak of a man as thoroughly converted, you must speak of him as having obeyed perfectly the will of God in His special appointment ; or else you must regard him as actuated by such a spirit as will accomplish that will in due time. Both repentance and conversion are founded on knowledge—the former, of virtue in its essential and eternal nature—the latter, of a special communication of God in regard to obtaining immunity from the consequences of the past, manner of approach to God, and the proper means of strengthening ourselves for the work of repentance or reformation.

In illustrating the difference between these two principles, we would refer to the Decalogue. The command not to steal is associated with repentance ; that not to make any graven image of God with conversion. It will be observed there is an essential difference between these two commands, yet both are very practical. In conclusion, we would say, that wherever we find the moral nature of man spoken of in regard to its change, we look for the word "repent," "metanoeo," or its derivatives ; and whenever we find his religious conduct or mode of gaining acceptance with, and worshipping God referred to, we expect to find the word translated "convert," ("epistrepho") or its derivatives, and the converse.

We will now proceed to refer to some of the passages where this word occurs, to prove what has been advanced. The passage, Acts iii. 19, has already been referred to, but we would again introduce it as being the first recorded use of the word in the form of a command. Reform your lives, and turn from Judaism to Christianity, is, we believe, a true commentary. The Jews had never been told to do anything like this before ; consequently, they had not been told to convert in all the preaching of John or Jesus.

Acts xiv. 15, Paul preached to the Lystrians that they should turn to God from such vanities as they were practicing, viz. preparing to offer sacrifice to them as if they were gods. It was not here a question of moral conduct.

Acts xv. 3, Paul and Barnabas passed through Phenice and Samaria declaring the conversion of the Gentiles. Observe that this statement is connected with the dissension concerning the Law of Moses (the form of worship.) The object of Paul and Barnabas was, to show that the Gentile Christians should not be burdened with that Law—that they had accepted the terms of the Gospel, and that they required not to be hampered with the ordinances of Moses. It was not a question of morality.

Acts xxvi. 18, Jesus told Paul that he had chosen him to send him to the Gentiles to open their eyes, to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God. Here the reference is to the purity of worship ; the light of the Gospel economy being substituted for the darkness of human speculations. In verse 20, Paul shows that reformation of character was required also. This seems deducible, however, from nature, and scarce required a special mission to proclaim its necessity, nor even its character ; but no one could preach conversion unless God had supplied some definite course for man to take. In Acts xx. 21, Paul says, he testified to the Greeks the necessity of repentance towards God, and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ. The latter expression occupies the place of the command to turn, (Acts iii. 19) and is to a certain extent an exposition of it. It still, however, points towards God-given truths and God-accomplished facts. The faith here spoken of is faith in a Saviour and a King, distinct from confidence in a moral preceptor. In Luke xxiv. 47, remission of sins occupies the place of faith in Christ, (Acts xx. 21) showing that that is the result of faith in Christ. In Acts ii. 38, baptism is found in the position which faith in the one passage, and remission in the other, hold in regard to repentance. These three passages offer a clear exposition of the meaning of Acts iii. 19, viz. : Such a faith in Christ as will induce us to obey his command, to be baptized in water into him, will procure remission of sins. Such a one, and such only, is converted or turned. Thus conversion, baptism, remission, faith, may be, as indeed they are, used interchangeably. Baptism suggests other positive ordinances; remission from past sins suggests forgiveness in the time to come. Faith in the death and resurrection of Christ (1 Cor. xv. 1) suggests his return. All these are associated with conversion, which thus becomes the great means whereby repentance accomplishes its perfect work.

The peculiar quality of a thorough conversion, then, is a practical recognition that God has prescribed not only objects of faith, but the form of worship. The errors of the Gentiles lay not only in the falseness of their objects of worship, but the falseness of their forms and ordinances. Neither will-worship, (a choosing one's own manner of worship) nor indifference to ordinances, can characterize the converted. Indeed, it would be a contradiction. The greatest importance is attached, therefore, to the form of sound words delivered by Christ and his Apostles. Conversion depends for its existence on them. A thorough reformation of character cannot be expected in the absence of conversion, or an obedience to positive ordinances, the result of faith in Christ, the given one; as this faith is the cause, and these ordinances the channel through which strength is conveyed to accomplish it. This idea is conveyed in James v. 19, 20, "If any of you do err from the truth, and one convert him, let him know that he who converteth the sinner from the error of his ways, shall save a soul from death, and shall hide a multitude of sins." If from no other reason, the use of this word "convert" here, leads to the conclusion that the Apostle is referring to one who may have been seduced from the true worship of God, and that he was thus cut off from the means of carrying out a reformation of character which he still might have a desire to do. The phrase, "the error of his way," seems more applicable to a form of worship than a declension of character. It will be observed that conversion is rather regarded as a means than an end. The sinner, wandering away from the truth, loses the means whereby he may purify his spirit, and thus carry out repentance; and he who brings him back to their influences again may be said to save him. The things to which conversion refers, or with which it stands connected, are all means. Faith, baptism, remission of sins, are all the means whereby we obtain salvation, as they are the appointment of God to enable us to reform—become like Him.

Jesus, upon several occasions, used this word in the exact sense we have given to it. Matthew xviii. commences with a question from the disciples as to who should be greatest in the kingdom of heaven. Now this was not a question bearing on moral conduct. It was impossible that they could doubt or dispute in regard to moral excellence. We must give them credit, we think, for sufficient perception of the glory of virtue not to raise a question affecting it, or carry such a one to their Master, its embodiment. It was a question of legislative authority. Who shall occupy the highest seat in the council of heaven, supposing all equal in virtue?—is the commentary we would make on the question. Now notice the reply of Jesus. He took a child, the type of implicit obedience, having no will, doing just what it is told, and said, Unless you are converted, and (or even) become as a little child, you shall not enter the kingdom of heaven. Our commentary, You shall have as little to do legislatively in that kingdom as a child in its parent's sphere; you must all do exactly as you are bid. It is not humility in relation to our fellows that Jesus inculcates, it is total self-abnegation of will in the presence of God. We certainly think that the general application of this passage to humility is wrong, if by that we intend to convey our general conduct towards our fellows.

Fearing that we have occupied too much space at one time, we will defer further remarks; but there are certain corollaries and conclusions which result, that call for further attention.

THE SEPULCHRE.

JESUS is dead. This is the grave of the Messiah. He who was crucified on Calvary is now entombed. The first night has come when Jesus sleeps. How gloomy and how sad ! The city slumbers and silence reigns. The song is hushed, and in the garden where the Saviour lay no voice is heard. It was a solemn night, yet it was glorious. Let us in spirit go to the sepulchre ; tread gently, for the ground is sacred. This is the spot where heavenly sympathies centre, and where the guardian angels are. The bright fair moon illumines the heavens, and the stars look down upon the scene. How careful have been the murderers. The seal how fast, the stone how weighty. Poor human fully thought the work secure. How soon that seal was broke ; how easily the stone was rolled away. The arm of God is mighty. Who can his power withstand ? The bright day has come ; the sun shines, and through the garden life and beauty reigns ; but Jesus sleeps, and the dark shadows of another night fall on the grave where lies the patient sufferer. This is holy ground. Here are the presence and the power of God. Slowly the dark night passes. No human being nears the spot where Jesus lay. The watchers sleep. Silence reigns. God makes bare his holy arm. Angels are quick to do his bidding. The seal is broken, and the stone is rolled away. He who had power to lay down his life, has power to take it up again. The dark and mighty grave could not retain him, and Jesus rose, the conqueror of death and hades. While at the sepulchre, my spirit feels near to the Saviour. His fond disciples, where are they ? Have they forsaken Him ? What a sad lesson this doth teach us ! The night is passing away, and just before the morning comes, the Saviour, by the power of God, rises a victor from the tomb. The Son of God, clothed in the light of resurrection's glory, left the dark and lonesome grave to obtain for man through the eternal ages, the happiness and joys of immortality. God's love and power were in and all around the sepulchre. His glance was in the grave, and now his mercy and his love shall triumph. Heaven shall conquer—hell shall be abased. Angels shall do his bidding, and Jesus the Christ is raised from the dead. The time has come ; death has lost its power, and the Saviour of the world comes forth, and by his resurrection gives us the assurance, that if we put our trust in Him when the last day shall come, we from the graves shall rise to honour and to endless joy. When Jesus arose from the grave no human eye beheld him ; God and the angels saw the change from death to life. Heaven was present, the world was absent. His Father in his holy love was there, but his disciples were not. Christ is risen : the grave-clothes remain : the grave has lost its prey. Christ is risen : this is our hope, our glory, and our joy. Christ is risen for us, that we may rise to heaven. Let every heart respond. When in the name of Him we meet to break the bread, let us with gratitude exclaim, that Christ is risen. Mary, with loving heart and anxious soul, while it was yet dark, went to the sepulchre. The grave was empty, her Lord was absent. Not for one moment did she think her Lord had risen, though this truth was uttered by an angel ; her credence was withheld, and she yet fears that he had been stolen, and as she weeps exclaims, " They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him." How lonely Mary felt without her Saviour ! And so with us ; his absence must be death, his presence life. Suffering sister, weep not ; Jesus is near—thou knowest it not, but he is with thee ; he feels thy love and counts thy tears ; he will be with thee, weeping daughter, and when thy troubles like a flood threaten to overwhelm thee, he will whisper to thy troubled soul the gracious words of peace. And while she weeps the loving Jesus speaks to her, and yet she knows him not. Again the Saviour speaks, and Mary knows her Lord. What a blessed meeting was this ! My loving Jesus, who was crucified and buried, lives ! Her heart thrilled with fear and joy ; faith and love mingled, and in the fulness of her soul she adoringly said, " My Lord, and my God." Deep was her love, bright were her prospects, strong was her faith, and ardent was her wish to tell to others the delightful news that Christ had risen. She now beholds Him who is the resurrection and the life. He was her friend, her light, her glory, and her guide. He brought the blessing of eternal life, and gave the precious boon to the believing poor. Hail! holy, sinless Jesus! thou art the light of life — the day-star from on high — the Son of God — the Holy One. Friend of the needy, sufferer for the sinful, he died the death that we might live the life eternal. Death over him is powerless — hell's violence is defeated. Clothed with a spotless glory, he lives for evermore. My brother, dost thou fear death? Think of thy Saviour. Does the dark grave appal thy soul? Look to Jesus. Though when upon the cross his loved ones left him, He, in the hour of death, will not leave thee. When thy body is becoming weaker, He will increase thy faith. When thy worldly prospects are all fading away, He will unfold to thy spirit the prospects which are pure and heavenly. When thou must say farewell to all thy earthly friends, He will receive you into his loving arms, and prove himself to be a friend who sticketh closer than a brother. Death severs the Christian from the world, but his soul passes to the presence of God! How solemn it is to die! — to leave all our friends, our children, and our loved ones! How gloomy and horrid would the change be, had not the Saviour died! Where would have been our hope? Dark, cold, deep, lonely, unsocial, greedy, and potent Grave, thou hast been conquered. Christ is risen! This is the rainbow of the Christian's soul — this is the key-note of the Christian's song, for in the resurrection Christ has become the first-fruits of those who slept. All must tread the dreary passage of the tomb. Kings and peasants, rich and poor, learned and ignorant — all must enter the dark realms of death. How the soul would shrink from it with horror, but for the Gospel promises! Christ our King has trod the path of death. So now to all the faithful and obedient ones, it leads to heaven, to deathless glory, to realms of peace, to holy angels, to sacred songs, to spirits saved, to spheres of light, to cherubim and seraphim, to Jesus and to God. How cold must be the heart which is not moved by a Saviour's love! How desolate and dark must be that spirit which is not the subject of the good hope through grace! How useless the life which is not hid with Christ in God! Out of Christ everything is poor — in Christ the poorest are made rich. Out of Christ death and vengeance meet — in Christ life and mercy are found. Farewell, cold sepulchre! Jesus hath left thee, and is now enthroned in all the deathless splendour of heaven. He is our only hope. Gratitude, shout thy praises! Hope, plume thy wings! Faith, be strong and valiant! Music, swell thy notes! Affection, cling to Calvary! Let all doubts fly away, for Jesus, our enthroned Immanuel, sits by his Father's side to hear our prayers, to plead our cause, and to impart with a benevolence worthy of a God, the blessings of immortal life.

DIALOGUE.

BAPTIST.—Good morning, neighbour; I have come over this morning for the purpose of investigating the difference that exists between us on the subject of baptism.

CHRISTIAN.—I am truly glad to see you, and hope that our conversation may be mutually edifying.

B.—In the first place, then, it is necessary to know the extent of the difference before we proceed to a regular discussion of said difference. I propose, also, that we commence the investigation, in the first place, by examining the office of baptism.

C.—Very well. Then, to come to the point, what is the office of baptism in the Christian system?

B.—It is a door into the church.

C.—You mean it is a door into the Baptist church?

B.—Oh, no! We baptize into the Christian church.

C.—What do the Methodists, Calvinists, &c. baptize into?

B.—They also baptize into the Christian church.

C.—If you all baptize into the Christian church, how then do they get into the Methodist and Baptist churches?

B.—Why, Sir, when we baptize them they are Baptists. When the Methodists baptize persons they are Methodists, &c.

C.—It is a Baptist and Methodist baptism, then?

B.—I tell you that we all baptize into the Christian church. We are branches of the church. We are Christians in each branch, and persons baptized into either branch are baptized into the Christian church.

C.—Then suppose we baptize them into the body of Christ, how, then, will they get into the branches?

B.—Well, Sir, if they are in the branches, they are in the tree.

C.—Then the branches constitute the tree, or the church of Christ, and being one in Christ, must bear the same fruit.

B.—Precisely.

C.—Then the Methodist branch bears Methodists, and the Baptist branch precisely the same kind of fruit?

B.—Baptists do not produce Methodists.

C.—How, then, can each branch bear the same kind of fruit? But listen! Do you hear a disturbance among the branches. Why the Baptist branch refuses to partake of the root and fat of the tree (Lord's Supper) with any of the other branches. See, it is literally cutting them off, saying that the Pædobaptist branches are covered with excrescences, (infants) and that it can never be a healthy tree until such diseased limbs are lopped off.

B.—You run your figures into extremes. It is not at all necessary that every branch of a tree bear the same kind of fruit.

C.—It is your own figure. You represented the tree as bearing the same kind of fruit on each and every branch.

B.—Now I will change the figure, and take divine authority for the pattern. A tree may have different branches "grafted" into it, as the olive tree, described in Rom. xi. and each branch bear different fruit from the others. Wild olive branches were there "grafted" into the tame olive tree.

C.—According to the nature of grafting, if a branch of a pear tree was grafted into an apple tree, that branch would still bear pears. But do you not understand that rule to apply to the tree of Christ?

B.—Why not, Sir?

C.—Did not those wild branches, the Gentiles, bear the fruit consisting of fornication, idolatry, covetousness, and other works of the flesh, before they were "grafted" into the tame olive tree?

B.—Yes! Paul tells us that the Gentiles bore such fruit.

C.—Then, according to your illustration, and the nature of grafting, they should bear still the same kind of fruit after they were engrafted into Christ.

B.—There you are mistaken again; for the wicked branch grafted into the good tree must partake of the nature of the good tree, and bear precisely the same kind of fruit that the good tree bears.

C.—Then if all the branches must bear precisely the same kind of fruit, the conclusion is irresistible, that the Methodist branch must bear Methodists, and the Baptist branch precisely the kind of fruit.

B.—I suppose that we have misapprehended each other, and overlooked the fact that fruit in Scripture refers to individual conduct; that individuals bear good or evil fruit, according to the state of their hearts.

C.—Suppose we turn, then, to the good olive tree, in Rom. xi. and see to what it refers, and of what it was composed.

B.—Well, Sir; the root was Abraham, and the Jews his fleshly children, the natural branches.

C.—And the Gentiles the wild branches, who became the branches or children of Abram through faith.

B.—And each individual branch must bear now good fruit instead of their former evil fruit.

C.—And being partakers of the root and fatness of the good olive tree, must bear the same fruit.

B.—Exactly. But I wish to hear no more about Methodists bearing Methodists, and Baptists bearing the same fruits.

C.—By the way, at what time was the Baptist branch grafted into this tree?

B.—Why, Sir—why, Sir, the Baptist is the true church all the way down from Christ; it is the good tree itself.

C.—What? Are the other orthodox churches branches of them? Recollect that you said they were branches of the true church.

B.—Very well, Sir.

C.—Then, if the Baptist is the true church, they are branches of the Baptist church. If so, the Baptist tree bears Methodists, Presbyterians, &c. including all of their varieties ; together with a great many species of Baptists.

B.—There never was a Pædobaptist church a branch of the Baptist church, Sir.

C.—If they are branches of the true church, and yet not branches of the Baptist church, how then can the Baptist be the true church ?

B.—Why, Sir, we are compelled to treat those sects with courtesy. But to come right to the point, they are only the branches or descendants of the mother of abomination, the Roman church.

C.—Then, not being branches, they are not part of the Christian church, are they ?

B.—Well, Sir, I dislike to say it, but they are not, really.

C.—Their baptism, then, is not Christian, but sectarian ?

B.—Exactly ; their baptism or sprinkling is only a door to sectarianism.

C.—To be consistent, they should baptize into the names of those after whom they call themselves.

B.—It really seems so. As Paul says, when the Corinthians called themselves after him, " Were you baptized into the name of Paul ? "

C.—Wesley, Calvin, Arminius, and Luther, should have been crucified for them also ; should they not ?

B.—Why, yes, they should have worn their names a little more scripturally ; for Paul says to those who say, I am of Paul, and I of Apollos : " Was Paul crucified for you ? "

C.—Then it is necessary, according to Scripture, that those whom we call ourselves after should have been crucified for us, and we also baptized in their names. Tell me, then, if John the Baptist was crucified for you, and you were baptized into his name.

A SECRET : OR THE PROFIT OF GIVING.

MEN are so disposed to attach the idea of profit with getting and receiving, that they wish to get all they can, and give as little as possible ; and the reason is, they believe it unprofitable to give. If convinced that it was in any way profitable, they would not be so criminally slow to believe the saying of the Lord Jesus—" It is more blessed to give than to receive." Though the profit of giving is not the only, or the strongest, reason to establish its blessedness, yet, a confident persuasion of this one would probably be more efficient than any other in securing the attention of men to the great subject of giving. Not having such a persuasion there are many guilty—yes guilty—of disbelieving not only the plainly inspired declaration cited, but numerous decisive promises from the same high authority. If, therefore, the profitableness of giving can be proved, something will be gained.

Before investing in any enterprise, or expending any great amount of labour in securing an object, the great inquiry is, " Will it pay ? " An affirmative answer usually seals the determination to make the experiment, and nerves the arm for effort ; while a negative prompts at once the decision to have nothing to do with it. Though generally shrewd in calculating, men are often disappointed. So anxious are they to make, that they are often willing to pay something for a "good chance."

Hence, in newspapers and circulars we often see advertisements proposing for a few postage stamps to send information as to some " profitable and honourable employment, by which any energetic young man or woman can easily realize from ten shillings to a pound a day ; " " how to get rich ; " or " a hundred ways to make money, " &c. But those who are short-sighted enough to risk such chances get nothing, as a general rule, only the undesirable information that they " won't pay, " and that they have been swindled into the bargain.

We will therefore reveal the secret of profit, or making—the true and desirable information, without money and without price, namely : cheerful giving for a good object, from proper motives, and trusting to God for the profit. But that none may fear being deceived, and that all may be benefited, we will derive our proof from the Oracles of inspired truth. " Give "—now for the profit—" and it shall be given to you ; good measure, pressed down and shaken together "—better still—" and running over shall men give unto your bosom." "Do good and lend, hoping for nothing again; and your reward shall be great, and ye shall be the children of the Highest" (Luke vi. 35-38.)

Again: "Honour the Lord with thy substance, and with the first fruits of all thine increase." But where is the profit? Here it is: "so shall thy barns be filled with plenty, and thy presses shall burst out with new wine." "There is that scattereth, and yet increaseth; and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty." Here we see both the profit of giving, and the unprofitableness of an undue withholding. Who that has been a close observer of the tendency of certain courses of conduct, but can think of many examples among men. "The liberal soul shall be made fat; and he that watereth shall be watered also himself." "If thine enemy be hungry, give him bread to eat; and if he be thirsty, give him water to drink, and the Lord shall reward thee" (Prov. iii. 9-10, xi. 24-25, and xxv. 21-22.) But again: "Bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse, and prove me now herewith, saith the Lord of hosts, if I will not open the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing that there shall not be room enough to receive it" (Mal. iii. 10.) Here is giving, and the profit promised is to exceed the capacity for receiving—more than any one who is not enormously greedy could ask or desire!

In these passages the duty of giving, and its certain profitableness, are clearly declared by him who is faithful and true. "Hath he said and shall he not do it? Hath he spoken and shall he not make it good?" It is said of Dean Swift, that on a certain occasion he preached the following with great effect as a charity sermon: "He that hath pity on the poor, lendeth unto the Lord, and that which he hath given will he pay unto him again." My brethren, if you like the security, down with the money."

So, kind reader, if you have never made the experiment, we would exhort you to give, for you cannot but approve the security. It is profitable to give, not only in time, but "against the time to come" (1 Tim. vi. 17.) Your giving or not giving will be remembered at the day of judgment; and the former will be referred to as one of your many good works, which will constitute, not the ground, but the measure of your eternal reward. It is to be feared many regard the oft-repeated demands for contributions to advance enterprises which have for their object the good of men and the glory of God, as godly vexations, and not as affording heaven-sent opportunities for the most profitable investment of the funds God has given them, mainly for that very purpose. What have we that we have not received from him? He furnishes the funds—asks us to invest them according to his direction—while he gives us full pay in other blessings, ensuring all the principal at the highest per cent. The wonder is that he does not oftener make, and we always desire, such demands. Here all can invest; the rich of their abundance, the poor of their mites. Who, then, can reasonably deny that there is profit in such giving, or will refuse to make such an investment of his funds?

EVIDENCES OF CHRISTIANITY.—No. III. OBJECTIONS.

CHRISTIANITY stands out in the history of the world as a system of matchless perfection, challenging closest criticism, having passed through an ordeal of fire for the eighteen hundred years with divine splendor.

No one objects to Christianity as a rule of life, alleging a deficiency, since its precepts and principles are adapted to every department of human society—the noble and the ignoble, the rich and the poor, no matter what the peculiarity of age or climate or the longitude of one's birth, whether prosperous and happy, or homeless and forsaken, in the vigour of health or prostrate with disease—the oracles of heaven brilliantly illuminate the pathway of man, and fill his heart with hope and happiness.

We will notice the objection based upon the doctrine of retribution. Many close their eyes to the influence of inspiration, condemning the whole because from the finite capacity of man he is not able to understand the infinite—Would it be consistent to deny that the Lord created the world because we could not understand why an earthquake should swallow a densely populated city—or a frost destroy the physical prospects of the race—thus closing our eyes upon the splendors of God's goodness around us, while the heavens declare his glory and the firmament shows forth his handiwork? So the Scriptures are full of celestial splendors, reflecting divinity of design; and although we may not be able to fathom the counsels of the Eternal, yet the impress of a divine origin is upon them, only to be denied by the reckless and abandoned.

Still, the doctrine of retribution is based upon principles of justice universally. Wherever there is intelligence there must be free agency, (with only two exceptions: the one infallibility; the other total depravity)—free agency including the power of choice between right and wrong. A person totally depraved cannot do right. The acts of infallibility are neither right nor wrong—two relative terms, the one implying the other. Man having the prerogative of choice must, in order to be certain of truth, have a law of right from an infallible source: for wherever there is intelligence there must be free agency, and wherever there is free agency there must be a law, and wherever there is a law there must be a penalty. A law without a penalty is powerless. Wilfully to sin against the law of God, is a crime beyond the capacity of man to compute, and the harbinger of wreck and ruin. Its penalty should therefore be beyond comprehension great; otherwise there would be no safety in the universe—the government of God would be destroyed—men and angels could sin, and after a term of service in some spiritual purgatory, would again be candidates for divine favor and patronage, thus perpetuating crime and rebellion; and upon the principle of the more wickedness the greater the glory, those burning out their pollutions in the fires of purgatory might be looked upon as moral heroes. No!—man fixes a character here; he enters the Gospel mould and fits himself for heaven, or he becomes debased and brutal, without virtue, a child of Satan, to be "punished with an everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and the glory of his power."

Objection second is based upon the atonement, alleging the unreasonableness and absurdity of the sacrifice of Christ for our sins, according to the Scriptures. Answer: If the doctrine of retribution be true, the atonement must be, or there is no help for man—it enters into all religions, and in Christianity alone are man's wants met.

Man is a dependent creature; a bankrupt drawing upon the resources of Deity for physical as well as spiritual life. If man therefore departs from the rule of right given by our Heavenly Father, he has no works to offer to cancel the debt. The theology of a certain class is, let the past go, if only the sinner repent. The precedent would be disastrous, whether in a human or divine government. Would it be safe to let a criminal go, because he repented of the past, without atonement or penalty? This principle would open our jails and prison houses, as well as augment crime, for the restraints being taken away, the infliction of punishment would be impossible. So in the spiritual. There must be some respect for the laws of God, and that we may see the damning nature of sin, we have only to look at the ruin following in its train.

Man, having committed sin, may reform and sin no more, and become as devout as Cornelius. No one can make the basis of morality the ground of ultimate salvation. Past transgression stands charged against him: Cornelius must send for Peter. It will not do to let past transgression go, although penitence is manifest, for the principle would undermine the government of God. If sin was of such a nature that man could pay the penalty of the past by the sufferings of a thousand or ten thousand years, then there would be no need of the atonement: for having commenced our reformation either in this world or in the next, and having gone through the fiery furnace, our robes burned white in its purifying flames, we come before our Heavenly Father prepared for blissful service; and if Christ chooses to give these purified sinless creatures dominion, and power, and glory, he can, without compromising any principle of justice without atonement.

The doctrine of Christ's atonement is based upon the impossibility of man's escape from the brutalizing effects of sin by human interposition. Neither men nor angels have power to meet the emergency. It is based upon the infinity of its nature—its eternal punishment; for if this was not its nature, and if this was not its duration, would it not be folly for Christ to suffer that he might save man, when man must inevitably be saved without that suffering so soon as his debt of sin should be balanced by a sufficient credit of his own suffering? So there would be an account open with every individual in the universe; and skill as an accountant would be of more practical value than the knowledge of any other gospel.

The Scriptures declare that man was in danger of perishing. "God so loved the world that he gave his only Son, that whosoever believes on him might not perish." Christ offered himself as an atoning sacrifice; he did not fall by the general sentence uttered against our race—he offered up his life as a legal sacrifice; and as Adam's transgression brought on legal condemnation, so the obedience of Christ laid the foundation of deliverance through faith.

The Scriptures affirm that he was wounded for our transgressions and bruised for our iniquities—"he died; the just for the unjust"—he sealed by his blood a law of pardon. We build upon him. "There is now no condemnation to those who are in Christ, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit: for THE LAW of the spirit of life makes free from the law of sin and death." This law is the gospel—the central principle of the gospel is the cross of Christ; and all that makes it resplendent with divine goodness and love, is the fact that man was subject to everlasting darkness and death without it. And it is equally true that the reception of it is voluntary, and if not received in good and honest hearts, we are liable to the same fate that awaited us without atonement, which must be punishment without the prospect of escape. The punishment is as perpetual as the life, and all the perpetuity of the life is in the original (aion) ETERNAL, translated everlasting; referring to punishment. This bulwark cannot be successfully assailed by all the legions of darkness and death, perambulating the world upon the mission of ruin. It is the simple unvarnished affirmation of the Spirit of truth, and will stand impregnable when the airy castles built upon a basis of perverted reason shall vanish for ever (Heb. vi. 2.) This judgment is denominated eternal, not because the decision will be unchangeable.

May wisdom be manifest in all our ways. Accepting the clear light of heaven as our guide, may we realize clearly our earthly pilgrimage through the desert waters to the blissful shores of immortality.

BOOKS OF THE BIBLE.

WHEN and by whom were the books of the Old Testament first collected and arranged?—By Ezra, about four hundred and fifty years before Christ. The five books of Moses had been kept with the ark of the covenant, (Deuteronomy xxxi. 24-26) and Joshua had written the portion of Scriptures bearing his name "in the Book of the Law of God" (Joshua viii. and xxiv. 26.)

What are the most prominent translations of the Bible that have been made?—The Septuagint, the Vulgate, the Douay, and the English, or King James' Bible.

What is the meaning of the word Septuagint?—Seventy. The translation was so called because it was made by seventy, or more strictly, seventy-two men; six having been chosen from each of the twelve tribes of Israel for this purpose.

When and where was this translation made?—At Alexandria, in Egypt, about two hundred years before Christ. It was a translation of the Old Testament only, from the Hebrew into the Greek.

How was this translation regarded by the Jews in the time of Christ?—It was regarded with peculiar reverence. Our Saviour and the Apostles, in their discourses, generally quoted from this version.

What is the Vulgate translation?—It is a Latin translation of the Septuagint, not of the Hebrew, and so called Vulgate, because, being the only version which the Roman Catholic Church holds to be reliable, it is in that church the Common Version.

When and by whom was this translation made?—By Jerome, about the year A.D. 400. It was hastily made, and became very incorrect by many changes.

What of the Douay Bible?—It is an English translation of the Vulgate, with notes and comments, and is the only English Bible approved by the Roman Catholic Church.

From what did it receive its name?—From the place where it was first published—Douay, a town in France.

When was it published?—In the year 1610.

Why does it differ so much from our English Bible?—Because it was made, not from the original Hebrew, but from the Vulgate, which was from the Septuagint, and was very imperfect. It could not be as correct as a translation made directly from the Hebrew.

Why is our English Version called King James' Bible?—Because it was made during the reign of James I. King of England.

When was it begun and when completed?—In the year 1607 the work was commenced, and it was finished in about three years, and published in 1611.

By whom was the translation made?—Fifty-four of the most learned men of the kingdom were appointed for the task. Seven of these did not serve, leaving forty-seven as the number who were actually engaged in the work.

How was the labour apportioned among this number?—They were divided into six classes, to each of which a certain portion of the Bible was given to translate, not from the Latin, or Septuagint, but directly from the original Hebrew and Greek.

How will our English translation compare with other versions of the Bible?—It is said by the most competent judges to be better than any other at present made.

What was the earliest division of the Bible?—That which is supposed to have been made by Ezra. The books of the Old Testament were divided into three classes:—"the Law," "the Prophets," and "the Writings," or "the Psalms." To this our Saviour refers, (Luke xxiv. 44) "All things must be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms concerning me."

What books were embraced in these three divisions?—"The Law," including the first five books; "the Psalms," or Writings, included the Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Solomon. "The Prophets" included all the remaining books.

When and by whom was the Bible first divided into chapters?—This is generally said to have been done by Cardinal Hugo, A.D. 1240. But as early as the middle of the fourth century, the four Gospels had been divided into chapters.

When and by whom were the chapters divided into verses?—By Robert Stephens, in the year 1551. It is said that he performed the greater part of this laborious task while on horseback, on a journey from Paris to Lyons.

SACRED SONG.

"Is any merry? Let him sing psalms" (James.) "Speaking to yourselves in psalms and hymns, and spiritual songs, singing and making melody in your hearts to the Lord" (Paul.)

CHRISTIANITY is a life in the heart—a blooming of the affections beneath the awakening influences of gentle skies that know no storms. Hence the religious element in our nature seeks and finds expression in poetry and song. No great immortal poem ever came from an unbelieving, irreligious heart. Religion, in its true meaning, unseals the fountain of poetic feeling; and, like an invisible spirit, guides those thoughts which touch the heart, and call forth tones whose sweetness was born in heaven.

To the Christian belong the treasures of immortal song—the gathered store of the beauty, and glory of the material and spiritual universes. In the one object of his worship—Christ—are hid all the treasures of beauty, tenderness, and grandeur—all the mines of wisdom and knowledge. Every quality that can now command and move the heart meet and mingle into absolute harmony and loveliness in him as the colours blend in the showery arch.

The precept to sing and make melody in the heart to the Lord, is founded in the highest reason. It pre-supposes that the disciple has exercised a spiritual vision—that he has perceived the Divine beauty and loveliness—that he has caught a true glimpse of the glory of God in the gentle and sublime grandeur of the spiritual world, as portrayed in the life of Jesus ; and that his heart is on fire to give utterance to the emotion which, like waves, bear him onward to the peaceful bosom of God. This is pre-supposed in the precept : for he whose inward powers or highest faculties have not laid hold of the character of Christ, can no more sing his praise than the most ungifted can touch the harp with the magic art of Milton. Knowledge, intelligence, is the basis of all religious acts, especially those of worship. We must sing with the understanding as well as with the spirit.

Perhaps we were never so celestified as when, the affections being in right tune, we sing some tender or sublime psalm or spiritual song. Under the influence of the sentiment and the melody, we rise out of the world, and leaving its despairing and discordant notes behind, join the assembly of angelic harpers, bearing our offering fragrant from the hill of Calvary ; and lose, for a time, the remembrance of bitter days in the gushings of infinite bliss. In singing, our souls visit heaven ; and though our stay there may be momentary, yet, like Moses, some of its brightness and glory will remain upon us, as we enter again the sphere of earth ; and it will enable us to toil on in the divine life, until our day of wandering is past.

Singing is a means of comfort and edification adapted to all conditions and circumstances, as, perhaps, no other exercise is ; and its power and efficiency for good will more and more appear, as it is more earnestly employed by Christians as a duty and pleasure. As a part even of the most private devotion, its efficiency can hardly be exaggerated. Anger flies before it, and malice and feelings of revenge disappear under its gentle ministry. The sour temper becomes sweet ; and the agitated and gloomy heart becomes tranquil and bright with heavenly glory. Selfishness—that winter of the soul—is dissipated by the songs of Zion. The spirit of love is awakened—the heart opens, and sighs for the happiness and joy of all creatures.

One great reason why there is so much apathy in the church, is because there is so little earnest, intelligent singing amongst disciples in their houses. Find me a Disciple who is given to song, and I will show you a man of true piety. "Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh." And "where your treasure is, there will your heart be also."

If a man's treasure be in heaven, his heart will be there : and he will sing of the glories of his unfading inheritance. Let us be careful to keep the precept, to sing and make melody in our hearts to the Lord. No precept in the Scriptures is more important than this.

MEETINGS IN HEAVENLY PLACES.

It will no doubt be interesting to most, if not to all our readers, to learn something of the character of the Annual Meetings of our trans-Atlantic brethren, and the results with which they are accompanied. In many instances we are happy to find these gatherings succeeded by a cheering ingathering of souls to the Redeemer. We give the following from the Banner of the Faith, dated August, 1860 :—

It is refreshing to witness the annual gathering of the saints in order to the advancement of Messiah's kingdom. When thus assembled, a foretaste is given of that heavenly society composed of the angels and glorified spirits above—of Abel, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob—of Moses, Noah, Daniel, and Job—of all the holy prophets and righteous men and women since the world began. How joyful the ancient Hebrews, as the day drew nigh when all, both great and small, might bend their way for Mount Zion, the city of David, the beloved Jerusalem of "the pleasant land." Speedily, cheerfully, joyfully, passed they on ; for Jehovah's presence was there. "Peace be within thy walls, and prosperity within thy palaces." Again was this holy city rendered famous by the assembling of the Apostles and others within its sacred walls. The countless millions of the heavenly worlds beheld the glorious Redeemer seated upon David's throne, as king and Lord, to bless and save the world. The Holy Spirit having witnessed Messiah's ascension and coronation in the heavens, descended to Jerusalem to make the transporting announcement through the Apostles to the whole world. What an important moment was this to ruined man! A visible manifestation of supernatural power was there. Jesus the Lord was about to grant deliverance from the burden of sin to all who would come to him. O! the happy privilege of being in Jerusalem at that glorious period when Peter preached "repentance and remission of sins" to the astonished multitudes; assuredly they all attentively listened, gladly embraced, and immediately obeyed! No; some mocked! Dear reader, are you aware that we also may enjoy, though in a less degree, a scene similar to that in Jerusalem 1800 years ago? God our Father, and his only Son, Christ the Lord, favoured that momentous day in Jerusalem. The Holy Spirit was there—the Apostles and eminent men and women coalescing with them were there—myriads from all parts of the Roman Empire were assembled on that sublime occasion. The transporting news of this joyful scene sounded throughout the untold millions of the blazing orbs composing Jehovah's vast creation. An occasion somewhat similar obtained, a short time since, in this region. On the 15th inst. individuals from various parts of this province, and from foreign lands, convened in Eramosa in order to enjoy a Pentecost bearing some resemblance to the primitive one. It was a most magnificent affair—all in heaven sympathized with and favoured us. Angels viewing the scene, exulted in songs of rejoicing in supernatural regions far beyond the Sun, the Moon, and the stars. The Apostles, alias their writings, were with us; also eminent men—chief brethren, not a few, were at hand to speak, and thousands as hearers attended, while a crotchet—a single note—making the resemblance more striking, discordantly sounded! The preachers and leading men in attendance were: Bros. Hayden, Bedling, and Jones, of Ohio; Oliphant, Sheppard, Anderson, Black, Kilgour, Lister, Scott, Parkinson, Sinclair, Ash, Farwell, Menzies, Buchart, Stephens, the McMillens, Trampour, Mitchell, Burke, Ross, Beattie, of Trafalga; Yager, Honsberger, Overholt, Hoover, Gray, of Detroit; Snure, Wardel, Elliot, Bentley, &c. Worthy sisters, mothers in Israel, were also numerous, but finding them not on my notes, I omit them here. Their names, I trust, are written in heaven. The brethren in Canada will certainly rejoice that those able evangelists from Ohio were among us. No meeting could be more fortunate in the selection of efficient speakers than this one—at least, so I judge. Brother Jones first arrived—there stood he in the hall on Friday addressing the people. O how solemn, eloquent, and soul-subduing! What breathless attention—what rich instruction he brings, and then enchantingly sings, "Am I lost in pleasing dreams, amid the soothing charms of the midnight moon?" No, indeed—it is J. H. Jones, facetious, unchanged! We were reminded of former days, when he and the immortal John Henry laboured together in the Lord's cause in Aurora, Ohio, May, 1853.

Just now, Elder Black announces the approach of Brethren Hayden and Bedling; they walk in—how familiar the face of our dearest friend, A. S. Hayden! Bro. Bedling's face is well remembered. Soul-stirring events of former years rush to the mind. Ah! these are godly men! whose hearts are filled with the Saviour's love. They seek not the dirty flesh-pots, the odious garlic, and the disgusting onions of Egypt, alias the heart-withering speculations of soul-sleeping destructionism, non-resurrection of infants, and such like hobbies of vain, ambitious, and disordered minds. Bro. Jones was followed by a solemn address from our aged father Sinclair, who is standing on the verge of the Jordan. Come, young friends, and hear the warning voice of a venerable father and teacher in spiritual Israel. On the second day (Saturday) we met under the spacious tent, brought from Ohio for the occasion, placed to the special care of Bro. Benedict. More than once were we, in former years, with thousands seated beneath this broad and waving canvass. A large attendance was on the ground. We were addressed in the morning by Bro. Bedling, followed by Bro. Sheppard. In the afternoon our good Bro. Hayden spoke a very illuminating discourse, followed by Brethren Oliphant and Jones. An interesting lady from Cayuga solicited baptism. It was an object pleasing and imposing to behold her facing a congregation so vast, to confess the Lord Jesus Christ! Why does Bro. Jones keep her standing so long? Still she bravely endures it. On Lord's-day the assembly was prodigious—numbering, as some supposed, 4000 souls. The first address was spoken by Bro. Hayden, on the sacrifice of Christ—solemn, persuasive, and admirably delivered; followed by Brethren Jones and Bedling. One was immersed and one reclaimed. During this day some 1000 disciples broke the loaf, calling to remembrance the sufferings of the Lord Jesus Christ on Calvary. Bro. Scott, of Toronto, and A. S. Hayden, presided over the Lord's table with order, dignity, and solemnity. What emotions arise while viewing a congregation so varied, orderly, and vast! All around are seen faces familiar and endearing. There sits Bro. Stephens, with whom we met at Bro. Ross' 15 years ago; here sits Bro. Anderson, ostensibly sound in health, but who was for a period of time near the Jordan of death. In another direction, retiredly situated, appears Brother Farewell, whose kind nature, strong mental powers, and love of the Lord Jesus, qualify and stimulate him to proclaim a crucified Saviour to a dying world—or ought to do so. Near by is seated an ancient friend, Brother Ash, whose mental affliction is intense—his beloved consort having recently departed to the spirit land. We should sympathize with and pray for such, that they may bear the loss imposed upon them with becoming patience and holy resignation to the perfect will of God. Brother Hayden's little music book, The Hymnist, afforded some sweet tunes and hymns, which were charmingly sung by brethren Hayden, Bedling, Jones, and Benedict. On Monday we enjoyed delightful hours. Teaching, preaching, and exhortation, truly illuminating, captivating, and subduing, were given by brethren Oliphant, Sheppard, Belding, Kilgour, Hayden, and Jones. Brothers Oliphant and Sheppard particularly distinguished themselves. Twelve came forward for baptism; the people in vast numbers surrounding the waters were ably addressed by Brother Belding, at the close of which the penitents were immersed by Brother Sheppard; whole number baptized, 14. This being accomplished, we assembled once more, and pensively taking the parting hand, we separated, to meet again, the Lord willing, in Rainham, bordering on Lake Erie, the third Friday in June, 1861. Thus peaceably, happily, and gracefully, closed the yearly meeting.

From another pen, that of Bro. A. S. Hayden, we quote a second account of the same meeting.

Many among us may not be aware of the extent to which the cause of primitive Christianity is prevailing in Canada, and they may therefore be interested in the following recital.

For the last few years the brethren in that province have held a meeting annually for the purpose of increasing among them the "unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." To attend this gathering of the saints, in company with Bro. J. H. Jones and Bro. W. A. Bedling, I embarked at Cleveland, Wednesday night, June 13, on one of the steam palaces that navigate Lake Erie, destined from the port of Detroit. We had with us Bro. J. S. Benedict, of Bedford, master of the great Trent. At Detroit we took the Grand Trunk Railway, and making our way up those beautiful streams, the Detroit and St. Clair rivers, we crossed over, at Port Huron, into Canada. At 4 o'clock on Friday afternoon, we arrived at Rockwood, the place of meeting, some one hundred and ninety miles north-easterly from Detroit.

The first session of the meeting was yet in progress when we arrived. The spontaneous brotherly love which greeted us, happily contrasting with the shyness and reserve too often manifested, made us feel at once that we were in the midst of warm-hearted and generous friends.

The assembly was large from the beginning; and, increasing, against noon, on Saturday, the tent was well filled. Lord's-day, the most compact system of seating could not bring all within its limits; and on Monday an assembly nearly as large was still in attendance. On Lord's-day about twelve hundred brethren broke the loaf of blessing together. It was a grand and admirable scene, to contemplate so large a number gathered from Detroit on the West; from about one hundred miles below Toronto on the East; and from the Northern shore of Lake Erie to the Georgian Bay—all assembled for one divine and glorious purpose, with hearts all animated by one impulse, and made joyous by the same Spirit!

As chief among the brethren, we were refreshed by the acquaintance we formed with the venerable Dugald Sinclair, of Amiens, now of eighty and three years, full of faith and piety, and yet able to preach to great edification, with brethren James Black, James Kilgour, and Alexander Anderson, of Rockwood; L. Parkinson and Edmund Sheppard, of Guelph; T. C. Scott, Toronto; Charles J. Lister, Bowmanville; D. Oliphant, Editor of the Banner, Brighton; James Menzies, Norval; W. A. Stephens, Owen Sound; Joseph Ash, Oshawa; A. Clendenan, Marshville; and others, whose names sit too lightly for record on the wing of fleeting memory, besides a large number of brethren and sisters, strong in faith, and fully alive to the work of the gospel.

We all returned to Ohio not only refreshed by the joyous meeting, but much encouraged to learn the power of intellect and principle of that population, largely of Scottish origin, and true to their national character, enlisted and pledged for the defence of the gospel.

Fifteen converts were added at this meeting.

Bro. E. Sheppard, of whom mention is made, was formerly a member of the Episcopal Church of England. In 1842 he resided in Nottingham, where, having heard the gospel of Jesus Christ, he confessed the faith, and was immersed into the names of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, for the remission of sins, and added to the church in that town in December of the same year. Subsequently he emigrated to Canada, and we rejoice to learn that he holds fast the faith of Jesus, and is proving himself to be a good soldier of the cross of Christ. We hope to meet our brother among the redeemed at the resurrection of the just. J. W.

THE UNITY OF THE BIBLE.

As in Beethoven's matchless music there runs one idea, worked out through all the changes of measure and of key; now almost hidden, now breaking out in rich natural melody, whispered in the treble, murmured in the bass, dimly suggested in the prelude, but growing clearer and clearer as the work proceeds, winding gradually back till it ends in the key in which it began, and closes in triumphant harmony; so throughout the whole Bible there runs one great idea: man's ruin by sin, and his redemption by grace; in a word, Jesus Christ the Saviour. This runs through the Old Testament, that prelude to the New; dimly promised at the fall, and more clearly to Abraham; typified in the ceremonies of the Law; all the events of sacred history paving the way for his coming; his descent proved in the genealogies of Ruth and Chronicles —spoken of as Shiloh by Jacob, as the Star by Balaam, as the Prophet by Moses—the David of the Psalms—the Redeemer looked for by Job—the Beloved of the Song of Songs. We find him in the sublime strains of the forty-fifth Isaiah, in the writings of the tender Jeremiah, in the mysteries of the contemplative Ezekiel, in the visions of the beloved Daniel, the great idea growing clearer and clearer as the time drew on. Then the full harmony broke out in the song of the angels, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men." And Evangelists and Apostles taking up the theme, the strain closes in the same key in which it began: the devil, who troubled the first paradise, is for ever excluded from the second; man is restored to the favor of God, and Jesus Christ is the key-note of the whole.

CHURCH DISCIPLINE.

THERE is evidently an error of most dangerous tendencies prevailing in many churches in regard to action towards transgressors. It is most plain, there are two orders of offences—one personal and the other against the cause. The Saviour said, (Luke xvii. 3-5) "If thy brother trespass against thee, rebuke him; and if he repent, forgive him. And if he trespass against thee seven times in a day, and seven times in a day turn again to thee, saying, I repent, thou shalt forgive him." At this announcement, the Apostles, in the hopelessness regarding one who should offend so often, and turn, saying, "I repent," exclaimed, "Lord, increase our faith." The connection shows they desired their faith increased in any one who would offend so often, and yet ask forgiveness.

Both private and public sins are described in Matt. xviii. 15-17: "If thy brother shall trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone: if he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother. But if he will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established. And if he shall neglect to hear them, tell it unto the church; but if he neglect to hear the church, let him be unto thee as a heathen man and a publican."

The bringing of a private offence before the church makes it public. This private matter may be forgiven, not only seven times in the day, but seventy times seven. Not so, however, when the cause is suffering.

We will take a case or two for illustration.

tration. Paul, in speaking of a worse than Heathen fornication, that "one should have his father's wife," said, "Ye are puffed up, and have not rather mourned, that he that hath done this deed, might be taken away from among you." There was no room for pardon in this instance. The thing was so monstrous, the servant of the Lord said, "Deliver such an one unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus." This was to be done for the health of the body of Christ. He adds, "A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump. Purge out, therefore, the old leaven, that you may be a new lump."

Take another from the same connection. "If any man that is called a brother be a fornicator, or covetous, or a railer, or a drunkard, or extortioner, with such an one no not to eat. Put away from among yourselves that wicked person" (1 Cor. v.)

We admit that a man who is overtaken in a fault should be forgiven (Gal. vi. 1.) A man, for instance, may possibly be so far overtaken as to get drunk, or swear and lie, as did Peter; but a single act forms not the character. Peter, though, had to be converted, and he who but once in his life gets drunk, must be forgiven in order to enjoy the Father's smiles. But the habitual swearer or drunkard is quite another character. He who has repeatedly and habitually been the subject of intoxication, must be put away. The health and salvation of the body of Christ demand it, and no promise should weigh a feather till the fruits of reformation are seen. The same subject was before the Apostle when he said, "If any man obey not our word by this epistle, note that man, and have no company with him, that he may be ashamed. Yet count him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother." The same matter was before him when he said, "Forgive him that hath caused grief, and comfort him, lest, perhaps, such an one should be swallowed up with overmuch sorrow" (2 Cor. ii. 7.) There are two points clearly pointed out in these Scriptures. First, the member who brought reproach upon the cause, in order to the preservation of the health of the body, must go out. Secondly, he must not be countenanced as a Christian, but admonished as a frail brother in the flesh, and every laudable effort should be made to recover him from the snare of the wicked one.

Our brethren who have spoken or written to us in reference to the inebriates, and other transgressors, in the churches, may see from these remarks our solemn conclusions. Put away from among you, beloved brethren, every brother who walks disorderly; and when you see one such fallen, pity him—labour with him, and when he is thoroughly converted, try him again; but as one has often answered, even in this, "hasten leisurely." T. F.

SPIRITUAL BALANCE SHEET.

"For I reckon that the sufferings of the present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed in us" (Rom. viii. 18.)

How frequently we dwell on present trials and sufferings, rather than on the glory which shall be revealed in us. We think more of the "light affliction which is but for a moment," than the "eternal weight of glory" which is in reserve for us. Paul was a man who knew how to work experimentally on suffering and trial. Perhaps no one ever endured so great a variety of suffering as he did, and no mortal ever had such manifestations of the divine glory. I never think on the above text, but I imagine a sort of spiritual balance sheet laid before the tried and afflicted Christian, drawn up by one who was fully competent to give such a detail of losses and gains, and of riches in actual reversion, as will not fail to cheer him amidst the trials and vicissitudes to which he is subject, if he will but calmly, prayerfully, and in faith consider his statement, relying on the faithfulness of that God who influenced the Apostle to draw it up for the consolation of the children of God. Let us now take a glance at the balance sheet, in the hope that we also may arrive at the same conclusion as did the Apostle Paul.

"THE SUFFERINGS OF THE PRESENT TIME."

In labours more abundant.

In stripes above measure.

In prison more frequent.

In deaths oft.

Five times received I forty stripes save one.

Thrice was I beaten with rods.

Once was I stoned.

Thrice suffered I shipwreck.

A night and a day have I been in the deep.

In journeys often.

In perils of robbers.

In perils by my own countrymen.

In perils by the heathen.

In perils in the city.

In perils in the wilderness.

In perils in the sea.

In perils among false brethren.

In weariness and painfulness.

In watchfulness often.

In hunger and thirst.

In fastings often.

In cold and nakedness.

Besides those things which are without, that which cometh upon me daily, the care of all the churches.

Total,

"Light afflictions, but for a moment."

Cr.

"THE GLORY TO BE REVEALED IN US."

For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man, the things that God hath prepared for them that love him.

That he might make known the riches of his glory in the vessels of mercy which he hath before prepared unto glory.

Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing.

When Christ who is our life shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory.

And so shall we be ever with the Lord.

Total,

"An eternal weight of glory."

The Apostle Paul having carefully examined the foregoing account, deliberately makes the following declaration:—"I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come; nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

ON KNOWLEDGE OF FORGIVENESS.

MEN's feelings are not proper indices by which to be guided, when they desire to know that their sins are forgiven. That peculiar quality, which is susceptible of change by every tide of air—by every degree of latitude—by every surrounding circumstance whatever, cannot be taken as a settled, permanent guide, to judge a fact—an actual existing fact. For illustration, we see a man emaciated and worn out by gnawing consumption. In nine cases out of ten, such an individual will express his opinion to the effect that he is getting well; but a few years, weeks, or even days, find him in the tomb. He expresses his opinion according to his feelings, which are not, in any circumstance, infallible guides. A great body of the sects, scattered over our land, zealously plead, both by precept and example, that our sins are forgiven when we feel that they are. They certainly forget that feelings are but the effects of surrounding circumstances. Carrying this out to a demonstration, we make almost everything a man does exactly right. Nearly everything a man does is prompted by his feelings. The faithful Mahometan is guided by his feelings, when he moves on to Medina, and there pays tribute to the spirit of the great false prophet. The conscientious Hindoo is actuated by his feelings, when he prostrates himself on the banks of the Ganges, and murmurs his prayers and praises to its limpid waves as they roll on in majesty toward the ocean. The Chinaman and Japanese are influenced by their feelings, when they desecrate the image of their Creator by giving honour, praise, and dominion to the Grand Lama, or worship the departed shade of their great philosopher, Confucius. All three would be perfectly right did we take the feelings as a test. But where is the man, who has any enlightenment at all, that will make such a concession? Then, by the same reasoning, cannot it be incontrovertibly proved that men's feelings are not the proper tests in deciding when their sins are forgiven? Paul was instigated by his feelings when he persecuted the Christians—when he “persecuted the church of God and wasted it”—when he “made havoc of the church”—when he thought “that he ought to do many things contrary to Jesus of Nazareth,” in Jerusalem; and he shut up many of the saints in prison: yet at another time he makes the astounding confession, “Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief.” The mere fact, that he felt that he was “doing God's service” did not make it so. We cannot think in the face of facts and reason, that men's feelings are the indices by which to be guided in deciding the question when are men's sins forgiven? But there is an infallible guide, a never failing evidence on this question, which we cheerfully recommend and approve, and that evidence is knowledge. We know when our sins are forgiven. Christ our Saviour has positively declared, “Whosoever believeth and is baptized shall be saved.” “Arise and be baptized and wash away your sins.” What further evidence is necessary? If we believe and obey, we know our sins are remitted, and that knowledge gives us reason to rejoice. Although our sins were forgiven, did we not know it there would be no real happiness. For my part, I cannot feel a pleasant sensation for anything, unless I know it to be true. My feelings, in this instance, are dependent on my knowledge; and my knowledge by no means dependent on my feelings. We sincerely trust that our sectarian friends will put the horse before the cart, and we give them our word that they will not have such a troublesome time in moving forward. G. G. T.

LETTER FROM JERUSALEM.

OUR readers have been generally surprised, by the secular press, of the fearful war raging at Mount Lebanon, between the Druses and Maronites; and have, no doubt, felt anxious about our beloved missionary family at Jerusalem. The following letter contains the latest direct intelligence from them. It will be seen that they are not free from peril. We desire to ask of all our brethren that they will daily pray for them, that they may be preserved “from unreasonable and wicked men,” and that through all this trouble the hand of the Lord may direct their ways. Dark and bloody as this recent record is, there is no doubt that the Lord will bring good out of it. We fully expect the downfall of Turkish rule to be precipitated by these events, even against the desires and policy of some of the most enlightened European nations. I. E.

BEIRUT, June 33, 1860.

Much loved Brother,—Having informed you in my last communication that I had left Jerusalem for the purpose of spending several months in Jaffa, you will doubtless be surprised to receive a letter from me dated as above; and I therefore proceed at once to say a few words in explanation.

Being called by urgent circumstances to attend the sick bed of my daughter, I came on here about three weeks ago; and although I found her situation quite critical, I am happy to inform you that she has now so far recovered that we could immediately return to Jaffa. But, unfortunately, we are detained here, however anxious to return, by the same cause that was the occasion of her illness—the Druso-Maronite war.

It was generally supposed at first that this was a mere family quarrel between these wild mountain tribes, that would blow over as soon as the Druses should kill a score or two of the Maronites—that being the bill of mortality in favour of the latter at the close of the last war; but it has proved far otherwise. The Druses grew so bold in the course of a few days, that they actually burnt up a few houses in the very suburbs of this city—under the Pasha's nose, and as it was supposed, in spite of his two tails. No less than twenty villages were to be seen involved in flames at the same time from the top of this house, and the volleys of musketry distinctly audible. It was just at this time, when a number of soldiers and an enraged rabble were passing these premises about midnight, clamoring for Christian blood, that my poor daughter, whose health and spirits too had become much enfeebled by the recent loss of two lovely infants, was stricken down with the serious attack, from which—thanks to an ever gracious Providence—she is now well high recovered.

The Druses, though not near as numerous as the Maronites, have been uniformly victorious as yet. And such atrocities as they have practiced on the Maronites and other Christians that have fallen in their way, I have never known. Not the slightest quarter has generally been shown either to age, sex, or condition. Not content with hewing in pieces innocent children, they pitch them alive into the flames on the point of the bayonet!—but far worse than this the fate of the poor women, and especially the nuns! The basest acts of treachery are daily perpetrated, not only by the infuriated Druses, but by the perfidious Moslem. About fifteen hundred Maronites were enticed into a Moslem castle or palace near Hasbeyia under solemn promise of protection; but no sooner were they thus inveigled in than they were stripped of their arms, and the Druses permitted to fire upon them from above till all were killed except about a hundred lying in the lower tiers of the heap, who feigned death till night, and then effected their escape. And horrible as such a deed may appear, this instance of cruelty and perfidy will by no means impress you with too abhorrent an idea of their baseness. Day before yesterday two French priests were killed, and several others wounded at the Pasha's camp, about four miles from town, at a spot where I had ridden a day or two before, even though protected by a safe conduct of Druses, to whom they had probably paid, as a ransom, all the money and goods they had in the world. What greatly aggravates the matter is, that those of their company who ran towards the Turkish camp for protection, were instantly shot down by the Pasha's soldiers—sent out avowedly to protect them.

It is estimated that more than twelve thousand have either fallen in battle, been murdered by the assassins, or burnt to death in their houses. Scores of fine large convents and various foreign silk factories have been destroyed by fire. Seven school houses and churches belonging to the mission of the Am. B. C. F. M. have also been destroyed; and lamentable to say, many of their converts have perished with them.

And bad as this state of affairs is, it would have yet been much worse but for the timely aid rendered by a British man-of-war, that happened to be in port from the very beginning, which frequently screened the coast and rescued many Christians at Sidon. The situation of all classes of persons has been most precarious on several occasions, and although as many as seven men-of-war, belonging to England, France, and Russia, (some of them first class line-of-battle ships) have now come in upon the requisition of the consuls who early sent out dispatches to the various Mediterranean ports, our situation is anything but comfortable. For the consuls and Pasha had an ugly blow up, yesterday evening, after a stormy conference of six long anxious hours, and whereunto the matter will grow who can tell? The duties of the American Consulate have been very onerous, delicate, and responsible during this trying time; but Mr. Johnson, I am happy to say, has proved himself fully adequate to the emergency; and his untiring efforts secure for him the warmest commendations of all parties.

When we arose this morning we found hundreds of an infuriated mob flying past our yard, armed with all sorts of death-dealing implements, for the purpose, as was said, of uniting with the Druses in an attack upon the native Christians; but, fortunately, just at that critical juncture a very large Turkish war steamer from Constantinople landed 2500 soldiers, and order was immediately restored. Soldiers are now stationed throughout and around the city; and if we could rely upon Moslem assurances we would feel ourselves comparatively safe. But news has just arrived from Dier el Kamar, where 2000 Christians were killed day before yesterday, that every Maronite that fled to the Pasha's army for protection, was deliberately shot in cold blood. The city is filled to overflowing with refugees from the mountains, and Mr. Eddy, one of the missionaries from Sidon, has just arrived with more than a thousand women and children. All sorts of rumours are flying about, and what a single day may bring forth no one ventures to anticipate. But our refuge is the Lord of hosts. Hallelujah! that the Lord God omnipotent reigneth.

Great apprehensions are entertained, by many, (who think the Moslems are at the bottom of the whole affair) for the Christian population not only of Damascus, Aleppo, and Tripoli, but of Jerusalem and Jaffa also. Some of the missionaries are still in the mountains — some unable and some unwilling to leave!

But I must haste to close these hurried lines — not having known of the expected departure of a steamer in time to write a deliberate letter.

Most sincerely and devotedly yours in the faith, J. T. BARCLAY.

PARADISE.

PERMIT me to submit to the reader the following observations on the word Paradise. It is derived through the Greek, from the Persian word Pardes, signifying a garden. Its first occurrence in the Old Testament Scriptures is in Gen. ii. 8, where it is rendered "garden;" "a garden Eastward in Eden."

It is found also in three other places, namely: Nehemiah ii. 8, translated forest; in Ecclesiastes ii. 5, translated orchards; and in the Song of Solomon iv. 13, translated orchard.

In all the above instances, the word is applied to places situate on the earth's surface; which places would doubtless be beautiful in their appearance to the eye of man.

Its occurrences in the New Testament Scriptures are limited to three, as follow: in Luke xxiv. 43, 2 Cor. xii. 4, Rev. ii. 7, in every case being, not translated, but transplanted, paradise.

It will be noted, that in none of these recurrences in the New Testament, can the word be applied to places situate on the earth's surface; but that it reaches forward to a condition of pleasure in which man, who truly follows Christ, may hereafter be found.

The "Paradise Eastward in Eden," in which the first man was placed, seems to be the antitype of that paradise for which many look. The earthly paradise was for a time unstained by sin; and, as long as it was so, was honored by the presence of God. Man, by sin, drove, as it were, his Creator from him; and at the same time, his own happiness. It remained for God to open a path by which man might regain his lost position, so that, when Christ and his apostles used the word paradise, they pointed out the restoration of this happiness, differing, however, in one important condition; the one was of the earth, earthly, therefore temporal; the other will be, from heaven, heavenly, therefore eternal.

UNBAPTIZED AT THE LORD'S TABLE.

WHEN at Birmingham, on the 16th August, I said that Mr. A. Campbell admitted unbaptized persons to "the Lord's table." I was asked for proof of this, which I now submit to be found in this very serial—the British Millennial Harbinger. I refer to vol. vi. (1853) p. 570; and vol. vii. (1854) p. 88 to 92. I will not ask for space to repeat what is there recorded, as most, if not all present when the proof was asked for, have the volumes referred to; but to which I could not, at this moment, refer.

In the Harbinger for this month, we have the "Correspondence between G. Y. Tickle and A. Campbell." The question proposed is, Do "the Disciples" in America admit unbaptized persons to the Lord's Table? The answer is, We do not invite or debar any one unbaptized to participate with us in any act of social worship. I entreat all who read this to take notice that Mr. C. associates the Lord's Supper with prayer, praise, &c.: i. e. as he elsewhere shows, we may have communion in the breaking of the loaf with all those, and only those, with whom we may commune in prayer, &c. This sentiment I hold to be true and important: and I again ask those brethren who have fellowship with the disobedient in prayer and praise, to test their practice by the Word of God.

We have heard that some of the churches in America admit the unbaptized to the Lord's Table. Possibly they may one day hear that some of the churches in Great Britain are so inconsistent as to admit persons to one "act of social worship" whom they exclude from another!

INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC IN PUBLIC WORSHIP.

THE brief remarks on the cover of this month's Harbinger, regarding the introduction of instrumental music into the worship of the Christian church, will probably draw forth a few replies and queries.

Those who, like myself, turned to the Bishop of Ripon's letter for elucidation of the views stated in connection with the reference to said letter, would find that it contained no allusion whatever to the subject of instrumental music; but was limited to the reprehension of hiring a professional singer to perform in a certain chapel, and advertising the fact as an attraction for the public.

The principle enunciated in the short statement on page 2 of cover, which, if acknowledged, "would put an end to all instrumental music in connection with Christian worship;" would as certainly put an end to many other practices indulged in by those brethren who seem to hold said principle, for the special purpose of bringing it to bear upon the organ question—as it may as well be called at once. If "whatever was connected with the worship of God, under the Jewish economy, and is not introduced by the apostles into the dispensation of favour is for ever abrogated," why object to instrumental music? We have no account of the apostles introducing part-singing, such as we have in our congregations, except the few in which its absence is regretted. If, upon this principle, an organ is objected to, why not a pitch-fork, or tuning-pipe? If one pipe be admissible for one brother, to enable him to begin the singing, why not a number of pipes, for all the brethren, if they find that an organ assists them throughout this part of the Christian service?

Which is most conducive to spiritual and true worship—discordant, jarring sounds, or those proceeding from voices attuned, as their hearts are, in unison? But it is useless to reason on the subject so long as the principle above referred to is maintained. I content myself meanwhile, by trying to show it is untenable, by suggesting only one or two inconsistencies, out of many, into which those must thrust themselves who hold, that in all the details of Christian worship, we have a "thus saith the Lord;" and that we are not at liberty to adopt any practice, if not literally enjoined, however much it may conduce to those results in Christian character which the apostles constantly held up to view, and regarding which, there can be no difference of opinion among the Disciples of Christ.

REPORT TO ANNUAL MEETING FROM SCOTLAND.

In the Harbinger for this month is contained a report by Bro. Rotherham, regarding his labours for the past year, from some parts of which we beg to dissent. He says "that his first year in Scotland has been one of considerable disadvantage, arising, principally, from the inaptness of the churches to lay hold of the work promptly and heartily." If any disadvantage has arisen to him, we are persuaded he himself has been the cause of it. So long as he assumes the right to have his wants supplied, whatever these may be, so long will the brethren feel dissatisfied with such a course. As far as our knowledge extends, the churches in Scotland were never backward in co-operating for the spread of the truth, but we may say were generally in the vain since our late Bro. Reid was sent out as an evangelist by them, some twenty years ago. The churches have a right to demur, to supply the wants of any labourer, when they consider them too many; and if any inaptness has arisen, to this cause alone it may be attributed, and not because we have been so little engaged of late in the work. We therefore do not feel at all surprised that the churches were so reluctant to complete the arrangement alluded to in the report.

At present, and we may say ever since the General Meeting held in Edinburgh, in December last, the plan of operations carried on has appeared to us quite loose and unsatisfactory. We then desired and expected, that a number of brethren, elders of a church, would have been requested at that meeting to carry out the views of the brethren practically. This, however, was not done, and every church has just been allowed to act as they think best—sometimes in concert with other churches, and sometimes not. We are fully persuaded the churches will never carry out the work unanimously, and with anything like energy, until another order of things is instituted. We want, then, (1st) A committee, or a number of brethren to carry out, and watch over, our evangelistic operations. (2nd) That the sum allowed the evangelist for the year, to supply his wants, be fixed by the churches.

The brethren in Scotland are quite alive to their duty, but they must see their way clear as to the relation of the churches and the evangelist, and the plan to be adopted to carry on the work, ere they can enter heartily into it. "Order is heaven's first law," and if this is not attended to, confusion will ensue. If some such plan as the above is not adhered to, we fear the churches will never act in concert to carry on evangelistic work. We hope Bro. R. will be more cautious in future in his remarks on the churches, and thus not give uncalled for offence to any one.

By order of the office-bearers of the church,

REVIEWS, NOTES ON PASSING EVENTS, CORRESPONDENCE, &amp;c.

"SALVATION SOUGHT AND FOUND." By T. H. Milner.—A very useful little production, well calculated to aid both inquirers and those who direct them. Several copies may be obtained by post for one shilling. Evangelist, in dialogue with Inquirer, gives important information in plain language. Thus—

In.—It is very clear now, Sir. But in regard to faith—saving faith, I mean—isn't it the gift of God, and should'n't I pray for it; for I would fear to trust to the faith I have as yet?

Ev.—Have I not just now been telling you that you are not required to trust to your faith?

In.—Yes, Sir, you have.

Ev.—But you are to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ—you are to trust in him—are you not?

In.—Yes, Sir.

Ev.—Well, then, do you think you could trust him? Is he worthy of your trust? Have you any confidence in him?

In.—I believe, Sir, he is all-worthy: of this I have no doubt, none whatever; but I have great doubt about mine being saving faith.

Ev.—Saving faith is neither more nor less than such a belief in the Saviour as leads to the reception of him in the offices he sustains. It is, in the first place, belief of God's one saving testimony, the gospel, and by consequence, a complete confidence in, and surrender to him who is the subject of that testimony—Jesus the Christ and Son of the Living God. This faith is the gift of God, by virtue of the Saviour being his gift, and the Spirit who testified his, and the Word of the Testimony his, and the opportunity and powers of believing his; but faith is not the gift of God in the sense that it was given apart from the Word; for the statements of the two Apostles are—"Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God;" and "If we receive the testimony of men, the testimony of God is greater;" and again, these are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye might have life through his name."

In.—Is it really so simple as that? Is the faith which saves simply that which the Word was written to produce?

Ev.—Why, what other would it be? Why were the Apostles inspired and the Scriptures written, but that, as John says, the reader might believe, and believing have life through the name of Jesus? What plainer statements of the matter could you wish than these now quoted, or than that in the tenth of Romans, where Paul affirms that the Word of the faith which he preached—which certainly was the genuine faith—says, "If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved." Do you doubt that?

In.—I cannot doubt it; and yet it seems so amazingly simple that I feel involuntarily to call it in question.

Ev.—And why would you have it other than simple? Doubtless you are at present somewhat perplexed by its very simplicity, expecting, as you have been doing, something far different; but say, would you expect a God of love to perplex and tantalize the poor ignorant sinner by needless complexity—by making the way of life difficult, if he could make it simple? Is not, think you, the very simplicity God-like and love-like? Do you think the gospel would have suited the sinner so well had it been involved in difficulty and mystery?

In.—No, Sir, not at all. I can understand why it should be plain; but do you really think my faith is what it should be?

Ev.—As to that, I will be able to answer after I have heard your confession of faith. You know what you believe before you confess it; I do not know what your faith is till you confess it: "We believe," says the Apostle, "and therefore speak."

In.—I hope I believe.

Ev.—My dear friend, it is not a matter of hope, but of knowledge. You know very well what you believe and what you don't. You know distinctly whether you believe my word, and why not God's? Paul did not say, "I hope I believe;" but, "I know in whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him." You certainly know whether or not you believe the record God has given of his Son, and whether you have entrusted yourself to the Lord Messiah as your alone Sovereign and Saviour, according to the gospel. It will greatly facilitate your inquiries if you will answer me a few simple questions, beginning, so to speak, at the very verge of faith.

In.—I will, Sir, readily answer any questions I can, to the best of my knowledge and ability.

Ev.—To begin, then. You believe the Bible to be what it professes—the Word of God to man?

In.—I do most assuredly: of this I have no doubt.

Ev.—You believe it speaks the truth respecting mankind in general, and yourself in particular, when it says that "all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God;" that so far as he is concerned, "they are all gone out of the way, they are together become unprofitable; there is none that doeth good, no not one."

In.—Most bitterly and truly do I believe and feel the truth of all this.

Ev.—Do you believe that, notwithstanding your sins, God loves you—that he "commendeth his love toward us, in that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us?"

In.—Do I believe that God loves me despite my sins? I think I may say I believe he does.

Ev.—Indeed you may believe it: for why has he spared you so long amid all your indifference, unbelief, and disobedience, but for his love to you? You recollect the Apostle's words—"Despise thou the riches of his goodness, and forbearance, and long-suffering, not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance?" What has been the object of all God's long-suffering dealing with you, but that you should be led thereby to a change of mind—to perceive, enjoy, and reciprocate his love? Do you think that God wishes you to perish, or to be saved?

In.—It is Peter, I think, who says, "He is long-suffering to us-ward, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance;" but, then, I don't think I have come to repentance.

Ev.—Neither do I think you have; still you are on the way: and mark you, it is the goodness of God that will lead you to it, especially his goodness shown you in the gospel. Let me put this question again—Do you believe God loves you?

In.—He will love me if I love him. Is there not a passage which says, "I love them that love me, and those that seek me early shall find me?"

Ev.—So speaks wisdom; and it is quite true that God will love you if you love him; but is it not true that he loves you, even though you do not love him? Does he not love you, sinner as you are, in order that his love, affecting, melting, and winning your heart, may produce in you returning love to him, which, manifested in your ready and grateful obedience, brings back to you his approving love? Does he not now love you as a sinner, that, affected by his love, he may yet love you as a saint?

In.—I would like to have that difference explained.

Ev.—Did the Heavenly Father love the Lord Jesus when on earth? Did he say of him, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased?"

In.—He did.

Ev.—And did David love the rebellious Absalom, and say of him when dead, "O my son Absalom, my son, my son Absalom! would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!"

In.—Yes, he did.

Ev.—Do you see any difference between the love that the Heavenly Father bore to the Lord Jesus and that which David thus expressed for his guilty child?

In.—Doubtless there is a difference.

Ev.—And is not this the difference—that the love felt by David for Absalom was such as we call pity, or compassion, while that intimated in the words of the divine Father to his devoted Son, is what we call good-pleasure, or approval?

In.—I see.

Ev.—Then do you think David could have loved Absalom as God loved the Saviour? Could he have said of such a one, "This is my beloved son, in whom I am well pleased?"

In.—Impossible that he could say that of him in his sin.

Ev.—Yet he loved him.

In.—Intensely.

Ev.—Well, then, so is it with God and man. God loves the sinner intensely—he compassionates him with more than a father's pity. Hating the sin of the prodigal, as that which has estranged him and rendered him a wandering, starving outcast, and a careless, defiant rebel against himself, yet God loves, pities the sinner and has not only told his love, but demonstrated it, so that there is no room left for doubt. Please to read John iii. 16.

In.—"God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life."

Ev.—And Rom. v. 8.

In.—"God commendeth his love toward us, in that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us."

Ev.—And 1 John iv. 9, 10.

In.—"In this was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent his only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through him. Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins."

Ev.—Also the nineteenth verse.

In.—"We love him, because he first loved us."

Ev.—Well, what of these testimonies? do you believe them?

In.—Yes, Sir, I believe them. They seem very plain now. I'm beginning now to feel that I have faith; and I feel it without looking in for it. It has come just as you quoted: faith comes by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God.

"THE VISIBLE CHURCH"—"THE ONE BODY."

AMERICAN Presbyterians have recently, after due deliberation, declared, in a formal manner, that baptism administered by our brethren is invalid. Their report thereupon, which is quite a considerable document, has been reviewed by P. S. Fall, A.M. He brings many of their positions out into clear daylight. The following may be taken as a fair sample:—

"In an age in which the evangelical church of Jesus Christ (though holding the same essential truths of one Body and one Spirit, even as we are called in one hope of our calling—one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one Lord and Father of all) is yet found existing in several sections, and under distinct organizations, and is surrounded also by various un-evangelical and anti-evangelical sects, no question can arise of greater importance than that of the signs of the church, and on what credentials a body calling itself Christian shall be recognized as a part of the true visible church of Christ."

Were an artist employed to delineate on canvass the ideas of the above paragraph, he would paint, were he a Catholic, as the principal object of the picture, one body of people animated by "the unity of a spirit;" if not "in the bonds of peace;" controlled by "one hope"—of conquering the world?—adoring "one Lord;" holding "one faith;" and administering "one baptism." He would be obliged, however, as a faithful artist, to represent this "one body" as "existing in"—or divided into?—"several sections," by walls of partition which effectually separate these sections from each other;—paper walls, it is true, but constituting the sections "distinct organizations," or, in other words, distinct bodies. Having finished this central object he proceeds to its surroundings. These are "un-evangelical or anti-evangelical sects," not sections—such as Episcopalians, in the remote distance; Methodists and Presbyterians of all sorts, on the right hand and on the left; while Baptists, and Shakers, and Quakers, et id omne genus, in the foreground, complete the picture. And what a picture of the true evangelical visible church of Jesus Christ! And did he belong to any one of the sections, would not his picture differ from this only in one particular, namely, that he would place his section in the middle-ground, and put "the apostate Roman Church" in the situation assigned to him by the artist of that church? He would, I presume, were he to undertake such a work, execute it as a Chinese did a map of the world. The Celestial empire occupied almost the whole space; and all the little continents and islands, which "thought themselves to be somewhat," were its surroundings, reduced wonderfully in size and in consequence. When even a small object is very near the eye, the angle of vision magnifies it greatly; and if it come between the eye and any other (though much larger) object, it hides that object from view, and prevents us from forming a just estimate of it.

But, my dear Sir, does this representation of "the true visible church of Jesus Christ," with which you open your argument—and for which I thank you, apply to the present exhibition of Christianity, or to apostolic Christianity? You make, parenthetically, a quotation from Ephesians iv. which, of course, describes the latter. Does the remainder of the description apply to apostolic Christianity? Or does what Paul says apply to the visible church—to what we now see? That what you say applies to it no one can doubt; but it is very questionable if Paul would recognize that description as pointing out the "true visible" congregation of the Lord. Do Paul's description and your own correspond—do they consist with each other? Let us see.

According to Paul, the church is "one body." You say it exists in "several sections, under distinct organizations," or in separate bodies. Paul asks, "Is Christ divided?" that you should divide yourselves into "sections?" "Were you baptized into the name of Paul?" that some of you should say, "I am of Paul!" "Was Paul crucified for you," that some should wear his name? And, by the way, are we not thus infallibly taught, that to wear the name of any one not crucified for us, and into which we were not baptized, is as much rebellion against the name of the Lord, as to refuse to wear that name, which is above every name? Let such as wear another name, and are known by another, justify it to Him, if they can. But for these names, the "sections" which wear them would soon be extinct. And what was the prayer of the Son of God? In the last hour he did not pray for the world. He prayed first for the apostles, to whom he had committed the honour of converting and saving the world, and thus honoured the instrumentality he had established; and then, upon the same principle, he prayed for those who should believe on him through their word, that they might ALL be one—just as much as he and his Father were one—"that the world might believe that his Father had sent him." If, then, your picture be correct, and represents the "true visible church of Jesus Christ," it would seem that that church has renounced Paul, and sets at naught the prayer of the Son of God.

You say, however, that all these sections "hold the same essential truths;" and specify these truths. The first is that above alluded to—"There is one body." Does the visible church, then, present to view but one body? Does its practice express its principles? Is the Episcopal body—the Philistines, as somebody once called them—a part of (does it amalgamate with) the Presbyterian body? Possibly you intend the words to apply to "the invisible church," when you say it is "one body;" for certainly we cannot predicate this of the visible—of what we see. That is not one body in which there is no schism (1 Cor. xii. 25); but is composed of as many separate and antagonistic bodies, each one "looking on its own things only," (Phil. ii. 4) and not "on the things of others also," as there are "sections under distinct organizations." If this, then, be one "sign of the church," where is it? There is no "church of Christ" with you.

Your picture is defective in one important particular. You represent the "evangelical church of Christ" as "existing in several sections," but do not say that each section contains more sub-sections than there are principal sections in the whole body. And if it be said that these minor divisions have arisen because of minor matters, we may justly conclude that the major divisions have arisen because of essential matters. This being so, the sections do not hold the same "essential truths." If they do, the act of dividing the body of Christ is most criminal and indefensible, and so is the maintenance of divisions. We hold that, as Paul says, "there is one body," and but one—that that one body ought to wear one name—and that its members ought to "strive together," not about words that profit not the hearer, but for the faith of the gospel: not about "things that minister questions," but for that "godly edifying that is in the faith;" and that its ministers should "teach no other doctrine" (1 Tim. i. 4.) Paul says, "there is one body and one spirit" in that one body. That this is the Spirit of Christ dwelling in His body, none will question. This is one of Paul's "signs of the church." These sections also, it is admitted, are animated by "one spirit" towards each other; but what sort of a spirit is it? Are "love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, fidelity, meekness, and temperance" its fruits? Is it distinguished by "righteousness and truth?" "If any man," or any body of men, "have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his." But evil communications corrupt good manners; extremes beget extremes; and a party spirit will be generated where there are sections to be maintained. I do not say that the fruits of the Divine Spirit are not found in many individuals in whom the religion triumphs over the party; but I speak of the spirit which controls the divided body that you call the "true visible church of Christ," and say that this is an evil spirit. Can it be a sign of the church, then? And if we study the spirit of each section, as having no reference to the outgoings, it is no better. The animus of no one section is identical with that of another. Specific differences enable us to distinguish them: as the features of the human face enable us to name individuals. What the differential traits may be, it is not my duty now to point out; but it will be admitted that, while the general attributes of each spirit may be, like those of every human spirit, similar, the combinations and manifestations of each are sufficiently different to authorize the assertion that each section has its own spirit. In this aspect of the case, then, the "visible church" has not "one spirit." Is it, then, the "Body of Christ?"

"Even as we are called in one hope of our calling." To whom do these words apply? And what do they teach? They are not Paul's words. Are all the sections called by the same spirit to teach doctrines radically at variance? Have all one hope? What is that hope? That sins are really pardoned? What a man hath, why doth he yet hope for it?—These, my dear Sir, are grave questions. Truly, the language you have selected by which to exhibit the "signs of the church," should lead us to look for it anywhere but in "Christendom."

But is there, in the estimation of the "visible church," "one Lord," and but one? I fear, were we to sift this matter, we should find that it has "Lord's many." What is the baptismal formula in common use in all the sections of this one body? "By the authority of the Lord—Jesus Christ—I baptize thee in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit." Sometimes the first expression is omitted. Now, it may be safely asserted that three, if not four, Lordships are recognized in this formula. "By the authority," is the synonym of "In the name." The above formula, then, will mean, By the authority of the Lord—Jesus the Anointed—I baptize thee by the authority of the Father, by the authority of the Son, and by the authority of the Holy Spirit. This is not the baptismal formula demanded by the letter or by the genius of Christianity, and if the lady in question was thus baptized—as your standard requires—she has not, certainly, obtained Christian baptism this time. The Christian religion truly recognizes but "one Lord—Jesus the Anointed."

ed." "To us there is but one God—the Father—of whom are all things, and we in him; and one LORD—Jesus Christ—by whom are all things, and we by Him" (1 Cor. viii. 6.) "He is head over all things to the church, which is His body." He is the proprietor—THE Lord—not only of the church, but of the universe. "The government is upon His shoulder." "The Father judgeth no man, BUT HAS COMMITTED ALL JUDGMENT UNTO THE SON" (John v. 22.) "To him every knee shall bow"—"and every tongue confess that Jesus—the Christ—is LORD, to the glory of God the Father" (Phil. ii. 11.) "ALL authority in heaven and on earth is His" (Mat. xxviii. 18 20): hence he said, "Go ye, therefore, and teach—disciple—all nations—to me—baptizing them into the name (not by the authority) of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit." His name, then,—that is his authority, His Lordship—is above every name; and in "all things he has the pre-eminence." Baptism is said to be "a Sacrament of the New Testament, ordained by Jesus Christ:" hence those who administer it at all, do so in his name, or by His authority. But we maintain that those who administer it in the name of the Father, also recognize another authority, another Lordship, which Christianity does not warrant: since that teaches that the Father has resigned ALL authority into the hands of the Son, because that Son made himself of no reputation, and by himself purged our sins (Phil. ii. 7-11, Heb. i. 3-4.) The same remark is applicable to baptism in the name of the Holy Spirit. It can only be because the government of the heavens upon earth is administered by the Lord—Jesus the Anointed—that this rite is performed at all; but it is manifest that the "sections" of the "one body" have no common understanding upon this important point, in what manner so ever a few individuals may practice; and, therefore, the "visible church" does not hold one Lord, one governmental Head. If to hold "one Lord," then, be "a sign of the church," is it not wanting in every section?

And what shall we say of the "one faith?" Am I to understand you as declaring that the "several sections" of the "one body" have the same faith? You mention and refer to your confession-of-faith. That is not identical with the Methodist confession; when each party considers the faith of the other, as a whole, to be most dangerous and unscriptural. You astonish me by your assertion that the several sections of the "evangelical church" hold "the same essential truths." Their debates, then, upon the essential doctrines, are to be regarded as shams! Their quarrels are for effect! Their divisions into sections are international—and their disregard of the prayer of God's Son is voluntary! The body of Christ has "one faith," as Paul teaches. This being so, what is called the "visible church" cannot be the body of which the Christ is Head; for its sections must be based on different faiths; or they have no foundation at all, other than matters of mere opinion. That they all believe some things in common, I doubt not; but Mohammedanism, and Christianity, and Judaism are identical in structure; and one of the two propositions to which each may be reduced, is the same in all. But they are not on these accounts identical as systems, as faiths; nor do they form parts of one body. It is a clear non sequitur to affirm that, because different systems have some points in common, they are, therefore, alike. Or that, because opposing parties believe a few of the same things, they have, therefore, "one faith."

If you mean, by their holding one Lord and one faith, that they all rely for salvation in another state upon the same Divine Saviour, while I shall not question the fact, I must question the pertinency of the quotation to the fact; and must add that even "the apostate Church of Rome" relies as fully upon the Divine Saviour, as does any of the sections that you may place within the surroundings of which you speak, on whatever else she may profess also to rely. Nay, while the very house in which John Calvin ministered in Geneva is said to be in Unitarian hands; and while the oldest Puritan foundation in the United States has followed in the same footsteps, the Church of Rome has uniformly maintained, without abatement and without prevarication, the true and proper divinity of the Son of God. And yet you will not, on this account, acknowledge her to be a part of the true church visible.

Do you wish to impress us, my dear Sir, with the idea that the "visible church" has "one baptism?" You name this in Paul's catalogue of the seven unities; and the church—the house of the Lord—when it reached perfection, had, certainly, but one. If this be one of the signs of the church, where is that church? Is the baptism of the "visible church" one? In what respect is it one? In form, in effect, in authority, in design, in application? Certainly, you cannot say this. If you mean, as is becoming customary now, that the "one baptism" is that of the Holy Spirit; then, supposing this to be true—which it is not—and that the baptism in or with water of all the parts of the church is identical, there are two baptisms, unless you can show that either "water baptism" or "Spirit baptism" is not baptism at all. And if the visible church has two baptisms, it is not the body of Christ, which, at the time Paul wrote to the Ephesians, had but one.

The last "essential truth" in Paul's catalogue is, "One God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all." Allow me to ask, if this be really an article of faith in what you call the true visible church? Do not think me to be trifling—but I must doubt it. The church is established that it may declare the Divine perfections to the world (1 Peter ii. 9.) It is to do this, as God has declared his own perfections to her; that is, by a living example. God was manifested in the flesh; and the body of Christ, which partakes of the Divine nature, (2 Peter i. 4) should be a manifestation of that nature in the flesh. The Divine attributes, the moral attributes of God, should be seen in the church. But before this is possible, she must in the same manner—that is, by a living example—impress the world with the conviction that there is "but one God." How, then, is this to be done? Can a church "existing in several sections, under distinct organizations"—antagonistic bodies, in fact—create in any mind that contemplates her the assurance that God is one? Can she do this unless she be herself one? Each church may have its own God; since every religion must have a god, or more gods than one, as its basis. One church, one God, must be axiomatic; but one God, many churches, cannot be. The Calvinistic God is not the Arminian God; nor is either of these the God of the Necessarian.

Supposing, then, that in Paul's words we have a description of the body of Christ, and of the essential truths it held then, and should hold now, it does not seem that, when we study the "visible evangelical church" in the light of your description—which coincides well enough with the facts around us—there is any very strong resemblance between the two. There is great necessity, I admit, that we study the "signs of the church;" and that we ascertain "on what grounds a body calling itself Christian" shall be entitled to the name; but I cannot see how any one can persuade himself that the credentials of the body of Christ, as given under the sign-manual of the Apostle Paul, can be claimed by the "visible church," as described by yourself and the Presbytery of Transylvania. The two bodies—if I may so speak of one of them—differ toto cœlo.

"SO IS EVERY ONE THAT IS BORN OF THE SPIRIT" (JOHN III. 8.)

THE criticism of M. E. Lard on John iii. 8, does not appear to me to settle the meaning of that much controverted passage. It is an important one, and worthy of all the attention that can be bestowed upon it. I am, therefore, induced to trouble you with a few remarks, suggesting a different reading to that proposed by him.

My principal objection to his view is, that it appears to me based upon two grammatical errors. It is with diffidence I say so, and if I am wrong some of our Greek scholars may correct me. The interpretation of the passage depends on the reading of the latter clause of the verse. As it stands in the Common Version it reads, "So is every one who is born of the Spirit;" or as M. E. Lard would have us read it, "In this way is every one born who is born of the Spirit." Both make good English, but of course the correctness of either must depend on its harmony with the original. It is here where I think the mistake has been made. The adverb translated "so," has in its primary meaning a declarative force, says M. E. Lard, conveying the idea of "in this way." This is not altogether correct. In order to give it this meaning, it requires to be in construction with a verb other than the verb "to be." When it is in construction with this verb, it is the mark of a comparison or illustration, and not a delineation, and may be rendered "like this." In support of this I would refer to the following passages:—Mat. v. 12, 16, vi. 30, Luke xii. 38, John xii. 20, Acts xiii. 47, xix. 20, 1 Cor. vii. 17. These are examples of its declarative meaning:—Mat. xii. 40, xiv. 10, Mark x. 43, Luke xxii. 24, 1 Cor. xii. 12, Rom. v. 15. (In some of these the verb to be is understood.) These show its comparative or illustrative meaning. Now in John iii. 8 it is in construction with the verb to be, and cannot, therefore, I think, have the meaning M. E. Lard gives it.

The second error is in the so-called supplement "born." Although to a casual reader the introduction of this word may seem simply an insertion, it is in reality a change of verbs. The verb to be exists in the passage, and to insert the participle born, is to change that verb for the passive verb to be born. This appears to me altogether inadmissible.

That verb is really governs or qualifies the adverb so, and therefore is an essential part of the sentence. If it be changed for the verb is born, (one word, remember, in the original) then indeed the meaning given to it by M. E. Lard is correct. He has, then, manifested great want of care in not examining the original, before so confidently pronouncing upon the passage, or I know nothing of the subject.

At present, however, I believe that the rendering in the Common Version is correct, and will not admit of any such construction as he suggests.

Regarding it thus, then, Jesus makes a comparison between him who is born of the Spirit, and the wind or spirit. I care not which, for the result is the same; or else he is illustrating the conduct of such an one by the conduct of the wind or spirit. We might read it thus with perfect propriety, "Every one who is born of the Spirit is like the wind or spirit," &c.

It may be asked, in what respect does the conduct of the Spirit-born resemble the wind? (for I cling to that rendering also.) In several. Nicodemus experienced the movements of the wind, heard it and felt it; yet of the laws which governed it he was entirely ignorant. It was independent of him—blew where it listed; he knew not its origin or its end. Like this is the life and life-movements of the Spirit-born in the eyes of the unregenerate.

In this 8th verse, then, Jesus, instead of vouchsafing a kind of explanation which still more mystified Nicodemus, inducing him to say, "How can these things happen, or come to pass?" reached the culminating point of his teaching. First, he declares the necessity of the new birth—then the nature, or process—and lastly, the concealed kind of existence the Spirit-born possesses in the eyes of the unregenerate; for Nicodemus can only be regarded as such. And is this not true? Does not the world wonder at the Christian? Believing not, it sees not the power which works in his heart. The motives which actuate him are unknown to the world; into his hopes and his joys it enters not.

But Jesus does vouchsafe an interpretation. The wonder-stricken Nicodemus was not sent wondering away at the mystery of Jesus' teaching. The subsequent verses are full and complete in explanation as to the whole matter. Indeed, we believe if Nicodemus had come in a humbler manner, then Jesus would not have clothed the simple truths of the Gospel in the mysterious manner he did. M. KER.

JOHN'S BAPTISM AND THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN.

A RECENT issue of the Christian Advocate contained a letter from E. E. and a few words thereupon by the Editor. A note from the writer of the letter asks our mind upon the question raised. Our first intention was to write a page or two for the Advocate, but having at hand an article upon the beginning of the Christian Dispensation, from the pen of J. S. Lamer, which in our opinion fairly settles the question, and is a model worthy the notice of all who would search the Scriptures aright, but which is too long for the Advocate, we have decided to reprint the letter.

THE BAPTISM OF JOHN.

John the Baptist was not the founder of the Baptist denomination, as Calvin, Wesley and Swedenborg are of the parties bearing their names, nor was he a Baptist minister in the current acceptation of that name. From Isa. xi. 3-5; Mal. iii. 1; iv. 5, 6; Mark i. 3, 4; Mat. xvii. 10-13; Luke i. 17, we learn that he was a man sent from God to "turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to the fathers," and so prepare a people for Immanuel. No man ever officiated for God in the same position as John. He had a mission to fulfil which was peculiarly his. He was not chosen to it by any Israelite after the flesh nor after the Spirit. His Creator selected and sanctified him to make straight in the desert a highway for our God.

"The word of God" which came unto John in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberias Cæsar, is said by Mark to be "The beginning of the Gospel of Jesus Christ the Son of God." He preached Christ to his hearers, and held him forth as the Son of God—as the life and light of men, full of grace and truth—as the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world—as having come from heaven, and as above all, the Father having loved him and given all things into his hands, and that all who would believe on him as such should have everlasting life. Though John knew him not until the hour of his baptism, yet he knew that he was in the world, and that he would suddenly appear. So exactly had John described the character and mission of Christ, that many of his hearers on seeing him said, "John did no miracle, but all things that John spoke of this man were true." Even the inveterate enemies of Jesus were conscious that John bore witness to him, which consciousness on one occasion so confused them, that they were compelled to confess lying ignorance. We may, then, safely say that John presented Christ to Israel as the Messiah, Redeemer, and Saviour of the world, and demanded repentance, confession, faith, and obedience to him as such. Thus did "the prophet of the Highest go before the face of the Lord to prepare his way, to give the knowledge of salvation unto his people by the remission of their sins, through the tender mercy of our God." The people among whom John laboured were broken up into many hostile sects, and laden with errors and iniquities which destroyed the most endearing ties of nature—alienating even the hearts of parents and children from each other. Now, the nation being in such a deplorable state the people were not in a position to see and receive Jesus as the salvation of God. So to remove these great obstacles out of the way of their vision, the prophet of the Highest bore witness to the life, light, grace, and truth of the Son of God, whereby he turned the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the hearts of the children to the fathers, and so by this gracious Word of the Lord, he exalted valleys, levelled mountains, made crooked paths straight and the rough places smooth, so that all flesh might the salvation of God, i. e. Jesus, for the Prophet Simeon calls him, "For mine eyes have seen thy salvation" (Luke ii. 30.) When Christ was made manifest to Israel at his baptism, the disciples of John, who had previously received the remission of their sins by faith in his name, now recognized him as the Lamb of God, and lovingly followed him, and desired mutual acquaintance with him. O what a willing people had John prepared for the Lord against the day of his power! It is, then, manifest that the disciples of John were believers in Jesus, and received him as their Messiah and Saviour. Now, concerning them who thus received him it is written, that "to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name; which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God;" which birth is explained by the Lord himself in the 3rd of John. John, it is said, was filled with the Holy Spirit; hence his disciples were made believers in Christ by the Holy Spirit, as well as were the three thousand on the day of Pentecost, though not under the same circumstances. It may, therefore, be truthfully said, that if the three thousand were "born of water and the Spirit," so also were the disciples of John. It is thought by many that the disciples at Ephesus who had submitted to the baptism of John were re-baptized. If they had properly received John's baptism, and were re-baptized by divine authority, it follows that the apostles, along with the five hundred brethren who saw the Lord at once, and all who had become the sons of God by the ministry of John and Jesus, were re-baptized after his exaltation. As there is no proof of this, is there not reason to believe, that if the disciples at Ephesus were re-baptized, that their former baptism was not genuinely obeyed? John was filled with the Holy Spirit—he saw the Holy Spirit descending upon Christ, and openly taught that he would baptize with the Holy Spirit. How was it, then, that these disciples had "not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost?" or as the new version reads, "we have not so much as heard whether the Holy Spirit is received." It is, however, evident that the disciples who were waiting at Jerusalem for the descent of the Holy Spirit received him, and were inaugurated into all the immunities of our Saviour's reign, on Pentecost, without a re-immersion. It appears to me that some eminent brethren, such as Hall, Noel, and Campbell, have erected an unauthorized distinction between baptism administered by John and the Bridegroom, and the baptism enjoined by Jesus after his resurrection. Has it not ever been one and the same ordinance? Is it anywhere in the Scriptures called "Christian baptism," in contradistinction from the baptism of John? But it may be asked, "Why is it called John's baptism, if there is no distinction?" In reply we ask, "Why is the gospel called by Paul 'my gospel'—'my ways which be in Christ'?" Baptism was John's only in the same sense as the gospel and its ways were Paul's. John's baptism, like Paul's gospel, was from heaven—was part of "the word which came unto John"—which is "the beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God." There is not a shade of truth that the apostles were re-immersed in order to be initiated into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, or in order to induction into the new and complete reign of the newly crowned King. If those disciples at Ephesus needed such a re-immersion, surely Andrew, Peter, and all the disciples needed it. It is true that the gospel and church went forth on the day of Pentecost in that fulness of blood-bought redemption, revelation, and organization, inasmuch that the former proclamation that "the kingdom of heaven is at hand" was now realized. Now they who were immersed before this day were prepared to receive the plenitude of the Lord's reign, just as some of them were formally prepared to receive aim in person as soon as he became manifest to Israel. But they who were immersed afterwards were at once initiated into all the riches and immunities of his kingdom. So this ordinance ever remains one and the same. Now, dear brethren, if any of you think I am in error, please write next month and shew me the way of the Lord more perfectly.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR OF THE "CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE."

It cannot be said of the apostles and the five hundred that, like the twelve at Ephesus, they had only been baptized into John's baptism; for Jesus, we are told, made and immersed more disciples than John. Again, that John's baptism differed from that of Jesus, appears from Acts xix. 4, where Paul says, "John verily baptized with the baptism of repentance, saying unto the people that they should believe on him who should come after him." John's disciples, therefore, were baptized into the belief that the Saviour was coming — was at hand — not that he had come, but that he should come; which is exactly the faith we might expect a forerunner and his preaching to produce. But once the Messiah had come, and was made manifest, it was no longer proper to baptize into the belief that he should come, but that he had come, and hence just here the stoppage of John's immersion and the commencement of the Saviour's. And here appears also the truthfulness of the reply of the twelve disciples of John, at Ephesus, and the propriety of Paul's rejoinder, as also the consistency of their immersion into the name of Christ.

In addition to the above E. E. says, "I think, from all the passages concerning the ministry of John, that he preached Christ as the Redeemer and Sovereign to come, more fully than many seem to think." Perhaps so — but a Redeemer to come is a Jewish Gospel, and not that which we believe and preach. Peter, a fair specimen of the best of John's disciples, was so little prepared for a Gospel which had in it the cross and the tomb, that he put it from him so that the Lord said to him, "Get thee behind me, Satan." John's Gospel was of a kingdom to come — "at hand" — ours is of a kingdom come. John's baptism had reference to a kingdom to come, into which it did not introduce those who were baptized — ours belongs to a kingdom already come, into which it introduces those who are proper subjects. John's baptism was into no new name — ours is into the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. Hence, after Pentecost, John's baptism was not recognized as the baptism of this economy. Acts xix. is surely a case in point. Those baptized by John were rebaptized before they could receive the Holy Spirit. True, John's disciples believed the truth given through John by the Holy Spirit, and were baptized in water, but it does not therefore follow that they were "born of water and the Spirit." Birth implies change of relation. When the Lord gave the one lesson of the Gospels upon that birth, he connected it with translation into a kingdom. That kingdom remained closed till after its King had taken his seat upon the heavenly throne. Peter used not the keys till then. But E. E. suggests that if the disciples at Ephesus (Acts xix.) were again baptized in water, though they had been baptized by John, it follows that the Apostles and the five hundred brethren who saw the Lord after his resurrection, were also rebaptized. But not so, at least in regard to the Apostles. Who baptized John the Baptist? When an ordinance is administered for the first time, the administrator must of necessity be one to whom it has not been administered. So with the Apostles. If they first baptized into the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, they could not have been themselves thus baptized. He who sent the unbaptized John to baptize, could in like manner commission the Apostles. As to the five hundred, it is not in evidence that they were not baptized on or after the day of Pentecost, and we see not the slightest reason for concluding that they were not. We cannot consider the baptism by the disciples of Jesus before his death, other than a continuation of the baptism committed to John. Their baptizing was not into the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, and it was not for translation into the kingdom, for that had not come — whereas, our baptism embraces both.

If the Kingdom of Heaven had not been at hand, but fully come, then we might more readily admit the oneness of John's baptism and that instituted after the resurrection. But the following will more than shew that the kingdom had not then come.

"The point before us is to determine precisely, if possible, when the Christian dispensation began; and as there is no text which tells us in so many words that it began at this or that point, it can be determined only by means of the inductive method. We begin, then, by observing and collecting the facts which relate to the subject; and while, for want of space, we shall do little more than allude to them, the reader will do well to examine them carefully in their original places and connections:—

First fact. Christ was a Jew; born of Jewish parents according to the flesh; made (or placed) under the (Mosaic) law; and lived and died under the Jewish dispensation. We need not pause to prove a fact which none ever denied.

Second fact. During his life, the Christian dispensation, or the kingdom of heaven, is spoken of, sometimes as future, and sometimes as present. For example:—"The kingdom of heaven is at hand;" "On this rock I will build my church;" "Thy kingdom come;" "Woe unto you Scribes and Pharisees, for you shut the kingdom of God against men, for you neither go in yourselves nor suffer those who are entering to enter;" "The law and the prophets were until John, since that time the kingdom of God is preached, and every man presseth into it;" it "suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force;" "The kingdom of God is within you—has come unto you."

Third fact. The limitations placed upon the disciples in their preaching, during this period, were those of Judaism, and not of Christianity. "Go not into the way of Gentiles, and into any city of Samaria enter ye not, but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." But in the Christian dispensation there is "no difference," and they are to "go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature."

Fourth fact. It is a recognized principle that the law or dispensation is changed when the priesthood is changed, (Heb. vii. 11-12) while it is revealed that Christ was not a priest while on earth, because the law of Moses was then of force (Heb. viii. 4); but that he was made a priest after, or "since the law" (Heb. vii. 28.) He was the end of the law—nailed it to his cross. He was afterwards made a priest after the order of Melchisedec, and then there was "of necessity a change in the law," or a new dispensation, which brought men "under law to Christ."

Fifth fact. The Holy Spirit, by the mouth of the prophets, predicted that this law should go forth out of Zion: "For out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem" (Is. ii. 2-3, Mic. iv. 2.)

Sixth fact. The apostles who were to open the kingdom—to proclaim this law and this word of the Lord, and to one of whom, Peter, were given the keys of the kingdom of heaven—were expressly required, in accordance with the above prophecy, to "tarry at Jerusalem until they should be endued with power from on high;" and then, when thus ended, they were to "begin" the proclamation of the word of the Lord, "at Jerusalem." They were also informed that they should "receive" this "power after that the Holy Spirit had come upon them."

Seventh fact. All this was fulfilled on the day of Pentecost (Acts ii.) Christ was then priest; the Holy Spirit came upon the Apostles: they were tarrying at Jerusalem; and Peter, with the eleven, proclaimed the word and the law of the Lord, "beginning at Jerusalem;" while the door was thus opened through which three thousand passed into the kingdom of heaven freed or loosed from their sins.

Though the above are not all the facts which bear upon the case, they are the prerogative instances, and are abundantly sufficient to enable us to determine the point before us. These force us to exclude such hypotheses as that the Christian dispensation began in eternity, or at the creation of man, or the calling of Abraham, or the giving of the law, or the birth of Christ, or the crucifixion; and compel us to adopt one or two conclusions—either that it began with the preaching of John in the wilderness, or on the day of Pentecost. Now the inductive method requires that, "after a great number of exclusions have left but few principles common to every case," or but few conclusions possible in the light of all the facts, "one of these is to be assumed as the cause," i. e. the explanation or answer; "and by reasoning from it synthetically, we are to try if it will account for the phenomena" (see Playfair.) We will assume, then, for the sake of testing its correctness, that the new dispensation began with the preaching of John the Baptist in the wilderness of Judea. Now, if this be true, all the texts which bear upon the subject can be clearly explained by it without doing violence to them, and without disregarding, in their interpretation, the forms of expression which are common in the Bible. Let us apply it, then, to the various classes of facts we have before us:

1. If it be true, then, according to our first fact, there were two dispensations in existence at the same time, for Christ during his life, recognized the existence and authority of the Jewish dispensation.

2. If it be true, then, those Scriptures in our second class, which speak of the kingdom of heaven as having come, signify that it had actually and formally come; but this is incompatible with those other texts which represent it as future.

3. If it be true, then, the direction of the disciples to confine their teaching to the Jews, is a law of the Christian dispensation, and, of course, still obligatory; but this, too, is incompatible with the commission, unless the "all nations" and the "every creature" be taken in a limited sense, to mean only all the Jews in every nation, which is contrary to known facts.

4. If it be true, then Christ must have exercised the priestly office upon the earth—which is also contrary to fact.

5. If it be true, then the prophecies of Isaiah and Micah cannot refer to the going forth of the law of the last dispensation. But they expressly declare that the prediction is concerning what shall take place in "the last days," or dispensation, when the mountain of the Lord's house—the government of the kingdom of Christ—"shall be established in the top of the mountains."

6. If it be true, the Apostles did not "begin at Jerusalem," but merely carried on there what had been begun some years before in the wilderness.

7. If it be true, Peter did not open the door of the kingdom on the day of Pentecost, nor upon any other occasion; but merely stood in the door, with his keys in his hand, which were altogether useless, as it had been opened by John, without keys.

This assumption, then, so far from being verified by the test, is shown to be wholly untrue, and incompetent to explain one single fact, without having its explanation proved false by the instant and irreconcilable opposition of numerous and various other facts. We are left, therefore, to the single conclusion, that the new dispensation began on the day of Pentecost. Let us now see whether this can be verified.

It perfectly accords with the fact that Christ lived under the Jewish Dispensation—with the fact that the kingdom of heaven was future during his lifetime—with the fact that the gospel was to be preached to all the world—with the fact that Christ was to be priest before the law was changed—with the fact that the law was to go forth from Mount Zion—that the Apostles were to publish it, and begin at Jerusalem—and that they were to do so after they received the Holy Ghost—and so with every other fact and document on the subject. The only apparent exception being those texts which speak of the kingdom of heaven as being in existence during his life—before the king was crowned.

If, now, the ordinary forms of speech used by the sacred writers will enable us to interpret those texts in harmony with this general conclusion, without doing violence to them, or bringing them in opposition to other texts, the verification will be perfect, and the induction complete.

To determine this we must take into account the peculiar circumstances of the case. We notice that John, Christ, the twelve, and the seventy, all proclaimed and inculcated the principles of the kingdom of heaven. The whole burden of their teaching was directed to the preparation of men for the coming kingdom. They told them what it was like in the material world; gave them correct ideas of its spiritual nature; and made known those exalted principles of self-denial, sincerity, love, and forgiveness, which were to distinguish its subjects, and which, therefore, were to be received and cherished as a preparation for that kingdom. Now those who embraced these instructions were spoken of as receiving the kingdom of God, or as having the kingdom of God within them, or as pressing into the kingdom of God, or as having the kingdom of heaven come unto them; and as these principles were greatly opposed, it was necessary for those who embraced them, to break loose, as by an effort of violence, and press into the kingdom, in spite of those who by their hypocrisy and falsehood were shutting the kingdom of God against men. Thus, by embracing those principles or truths which were certain to conduct them into the kingdom which was at hand and ready to be formally set up, they could, by anticipation, and in perfect accordance with the usages of Scripture, be said to enter or to have entered the kingdom.

But is it a usual or frequent form of expression in the Bible, to represent things as having actually occurred which are yet future, but which, from the certainty of their coming, are virtually the same as past?

In that beautiful prophecy concerning our Saviour, in the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah, we read, "He is despised and rejected of men. . . And we hid as it were our faces from him. . . Surely he hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows; yet we did esteem him stricken, smitten of God and afflicted. And so throughout. "He was wounded"—"he was bruised"—"the chastisement of our peace was laid upon him," &c. The Lamb of God was virtually slain in the days of Isaiah—nay, from the foundation of the world; and it could, therefore, be spoken of by anticipation as having really occurred; and yet no one would presume to argue from this circumstance that, as an historical event, the actual occurrence took place one moment anterior to the time of Pontius Pilate, and the day and hour specified by the Apostles.

Our Saviour tells his disciples (Mark ix. 31) that "the Son of Man is delivered into the hands of men;" while his actual delivery into their hands was long afterwards.

In the institution of the supper he tells them: "This is my body broken for you—and my blood shed for you;" while he was yet alive.

We consider the demonstration complete. When Jesus died, the kingdom was yet to come—when the three thousand were baptized, they were translated into it. D. K.

WORDS FROM THE WORK- TABLE.—No. VI.

"Look to yourselves" (2 John viii.)

"Whereas, a tall well-made person, of genteel mien, smooth tongue, and fine address, who can converse freely on almost anything and everything of the world—its religion, sciences, politics, &c.; and who generally affects to keep the most polite company, continues very frequently to insinuate himself into the society and converse of CHRISTIANS, and in many cases really appears very engaging—so much so, that many professors are quite captivated with his manners; yet he never leaves them, but he is sure to injure them; and though they find, after he has withdrawn from them, that they have suffered loss, yet so bewitched are they with his presence, as to admit him again and again into their company. Now, in order that this person may be well-known, and well guarded against, you will please to observe, gentle reader, that his complexion and conversation are such as please the flesh only, but are quite contrary to the spirit of Christianity. And his name (which he is very loath to own, and desires to conceal) is, though somewhat lengthy, quite expressive of his real character—Busy-body, Tatler, Tale-bearer."

Gisborne has pretty nearly the following words:—"From a busy and meddling temper is derived a loquacious interference in the concerns of other men. The people of Athens, when St. Paul was in their city, spent their time in nothing else but either to tell or to hear some new thing. Some professing Christians seem, by their conduct, to be descendants of these Athenians. Impelled by curiosity, they search out every transaction of the neighbourhood—sift it again and again to the very bottom, and treasure up in their memories—in such matters too faithful—each particle of intelligence which they have collected. They pry into the interior of families—worm out every incident of the day—make themselves masters of every change in the domestic arrangement—and discover every projected plan of alteration almost as soon as it is formed, often before it has been digested, by the person who devised it. The store of news which they have thus acquired, vanity and self-importance (or worse) urge them to communicate. Hence from busy-bodies they advance to be tale-bearers. Wherever they wander they spread mischief. If they employ, for the gratification of malevolence, the tidings which the spirit of curiosity has gleaned, they are among the most dangerous of mankind. But what if they are actuated merely by the love of tattling? They encourage idleness, they influence inquisitiveness, they betray secrets, they excite quarrels, they prolong dissensions."

Hear with what accuracy they are characterized in the Scriptures. "A serpent will bite; a babbler is no better. The words of a tale-bearer are wounds. A tale-bearer revealeth secrets. He that repealeth a matter separateth chief friends. Where no wood is, the fire goeth out; so where there is no tale-bearer, the strife ceaseth."

Hear the positive commands of God. "Thou shalt not go up and down as a tale-bearer among thy people. Let none of you suffer as a busy-body in other men's matters. Study to be QUIET, and do your own business."

Reader, do you know a brother or a sister doing a little in this line? If so, kindly and lovingly give a warning. But stop! Another question first—Are you quite clear yourself? Learn a lesson from President Edwards, who resolved never to speak evil of any one, unless some particular good called for it; and to that add another—Listen not to evil speaking, unless in the way of duty, and for the purpose of amendment. Remember that—

"Whoever keeps an open ear
For tattlers, will be sure to hear
The trumpet of contention:
Aspersions is the babblers' trade—
To listen is to lend him aid,
And rush into dissension."

"As you were," is a word of command sometimes absolutely requisite. A step taken may have to be retraced, not because in itself it was a bad one, but on account of subsequent facts rendering the return necessary. When the step has been retraced, it follows not that time and labor have been lost—advantages immediate and remote may have been secured. That this last conclusion applies to the case we are about to record, is affirmed by those who formerly met in Cherry-street, and by many others.

On Friday, August 31, over 100 brethren, members of the church in Bond-street, met in the Assembly Room, Broad-street, two well-known and highly-esteemed brethren from a distance being present. Bro. King presided, and the following resolution was passed, no one voting against it:—

"That the brethren present, feeling that circumstances have arisen which make it necessary to open a meeting-place other than Bond-street chapel, hereby authorise Bro. King, with the assistance of brethren, to look out for and engage another place for the observance of the Christian ordinances and proclaiming the Gospel."

Accordingly, the Odd Fellows' Hall was taken, and on the Lord's day following the brethren formerly of Cherry-street, with others, commemorated the Lord's death therein. Declaration of withdrawal from Bond-street was made by one hundred and twenty-nine members, including (notwithstanding that many had earnestly desired to remain) every member that went from Cherry-street, and over forty others.

Though our place of meeting has not yet been advertized, we have had good attendance—four were last week added by immersion, and this evening Bro. King is expected to baptize at least six others.

From all parts of the town we are congratulated upon having taken the step we have been compelled to take, and are assured of a hearing and influence superior to those up to this time obtained. S. J. Chew remains at Bond-street. D. K.

THETFORD.

I am happy to inform you, that we have been cheered by the addition of two to our number; one who until lately was a local preacher among the Primitive Methodists, confessed his Lord, and was buried with him on Lord's day, Sept. 9; and the other from the world on the 16th. We were favored with a visit from our Bro. Ludbrook, of London, on the first-named day, and trust great success may attend our efforts.

A DECEIVER.

We copy the following paragraph from the Banner of the Faith of August, 1860:—"A distant son of Adam, by the name of St. Clair, once in Canada, then in New York city, next in England, and latterly in Nova Scotia, is to be regarded as one of the most genteel and successful deceivers. He is at times a Baptist, at times a Disciple, as best may suit his immediate interests." With the name we are familiar, and it may be that some of our readers also remember it. Possibly the same party may be again in this country, in pursuit of the same unworthy ends.

FOREIGN ITEMS.

MELBOURNE (VICTORIA.)

Bro. Service, writing under date of July 25, states, that since writing on April 24, three have been added to the disciples in this place.

UNITED STATES.

We abridge the following interesting intelligence from the Christian Review of August 28, 1860:—

NORTH CAROLINA.—Bro. J. Latham, writing from Samson county, under date of August 15, 1860, furnishes an account of a visit which he paid to three churches in that division, and his labors amongst them for some months. Elder D. H. Cason assisted at the meetings, and at the close 113 had been added to the three churches, 95 having been baptized during the last month.

MISSOURI.—Bro. C. Carlton, under date of Springfield, August 10, reports the close of their annual meeting with an addition of 67. Bro. R. Graham, who has resigned his position in Kentucky University that he might give himself wholly to the work of evangelization, was present; and such being the first-fruits, what a glorious harvest will be gathered in by his labors!

OHIO.—Sister A. E. Peoples, writing from Orange, under date of August 11, gives an account of the results which followed the labors of Bro. E. T. Mitchell there in July, viz. after meetings at Moorestown and Bungtown, on the 28th and 29th, there were 26 additions; and at Bedford, on the 4th of August, 10 made the good confession. The church being some distance from the water, Bro. M. adjourned to a situation where the water was more convenient. After preaching in a large barn, four young ladies having made the good confession, were immersed. While at the water, four gentlemen came forward, one of them saying, "I have resisted as long as I can; I want now to serve the Lord." His mother, 85 years of age, who had been a Methodist many years, seeing her children come forward, for whom she had prayed many years, also united with us. From July 21 to August 11, there were fifty immersioners. — Bro. W. A. Belding, writing from Mentor, under date of August 13, has the following:—"Just closed a very happy meeting with Bro. J. W. Errett and the brethren in New Salem, Greene co. when 28 were added to the army of the Lord, and nearly 300 dollars pledged to the cause of missions. I have witnessed nearly 100 confessions since our May meeting."

TENNESSEE.—Bro. O. D. Williams, writing from Alexandria, under date of August 18, reports the holding of a protracted meeting at that place which resulted in 8 additions. The cause is rapidly gaining ground in this part of the State.

THE BIBLE NO IMPOSITION.

THE Scriptures are the work of bad men, or devils; or good men, or God.

Bad men always hate the Bible, often persecute it, and would never have been the authors of a book enjoining such strict holiness, and laying sin under such an awful curse.

Devils would have never originated a book which exposes their hateful character, and strikes such a blow at the heart of their kingdom.

Good men, though the amanuenses of God, were not the authors of the Scriptures, for they profess to write by divine inspiration; if they did not, they were gross impostors, and not good men.

The only remaining supposition is, that God is the real Author of the Bible. And is it in every way worthy of such an author—in the sublimity of its doctrines, in the pureness of its morality, in the benevolence of its spirit, in the consolation it affords in affliction and death? Take away the Bible, and we have no certain knowledge of the creation of the world, of the introduction of sin, of the terms of pardon, of the immortality of the soul, or of the character of God with whom we have to do.

No philosopher can account for the rise, progress, and prevalence of Christianity, in opposition to every feeling of the heart, every prejudice of the mind, and every interest of the present life, without admitting that a divine power attended its first promulgation.

Truth bears inspection. The more the Bible is candidly studied, the more highly is it valued. Deists are for the most part ignorant of its contents, and immoral in their lives. Those who have not freely inquired, cannot fairly decide; and if the Scriptures reprove sin, no wonder sinners hate the Scriptures.

Deism is a cheat; and so have many of its advocates found it, when a death-bed detected its folly. Christianity is increasingly precious in that trying hour; and strange to tell, the instance is not recorded of a man who died regretting his faith in the Word of God, or warning his friends against the delusion of the Bible.

If Deism is true, the Christian dies safe; if Christianity is true, the Deist dies condemned. The follower of Jesus has every thing to lose, and nothing to gain.

Reader, which of the two is wisest?—which happiest?—which best? Which would you rather have it said that you were, when you are dead? Which are you now?

ADVICE TO THE YOUNG.

IMPROVE your time. Form a habit of reading good books, and read leisurely. Remember what you read; and the easiest way to remember is, first to understand it perfectly. Remember that. Get another habit—that of thinking. Reading gives one information; the practice of thinking over every subject closely gives power. It is power that is of value everywhere. Many a learned man is learned merely. What is needed most is the possession and perfect command of one's faculties. He who can think accurately, speak readily, and act promptly and well, is well educated.

Avoid careless habits in everything. If you read aloud, read distinctly and deliberately, pronouncing every letter, and giving every accent and tone in the best possible style. In writing, be careful to do your best. Spell, punctuate, form your letters and words—do everything as well as possible.

When you are engaged at anything, follow it up until thoroughly done. If reading a book, and you come upon a word you do not understand, go to the dictionary at once. Have it at hand, to lose no time. Do not hesitate to ask for information, for fear you may be considered ignorant. Lately, one of the best educated men we know asked us how to spell a very common word. Learn something of value daily—make this a rule. Learn, in a polite and modest way, to question and cross-question persons you are in company with. The most ignorant person knows something that the wisest man does not. "I tax every man I meet to teach me something," said Alexander Campbell.

OWE NO MAN ANYTHING.

A good apostolic injunction—owe no man anything, save good will, and take every opportunity of paying that. Probably the greatest hindrance to universal social harmony and comfort, is the almost as universal pecuniary obligation of mankind. The whole machinery of living is obstructed for want of "square accounts." The credit system carries with it a corroding interest, extra charges, disputed transactions, continual litigation, and, in innumerable cases, life-long ruptures of friendship. All parties suffer under the owing system. Services are performed less promptly and efficiently, and wares are delivered less cheerfully on trust. It is "pay down" that keeps the wheels in smooth and lively motion. He who has to wait for his dues, may reasonably plead the fact in excuse for not paying his debts, and thus the involvement becomes general. The result is a periodical crisis, a storm of bankruptcy, and a fresh start on the same old track. The debts of nations oppress the people with taxes, and the debts of individuals are prolific of tax and feud. And besides widespread discomfort and harassment, personal independence is involved in pecuniary debt. Every man knows the value of his peace in being able to say, "I owe no man anything, save good will."

MUSIC IN CHURCHES.

A GENTLEMAN who was travelling in Germany made the inquiry in an important place in which he happened to be on the Sabbath, in which church he would be likely to hear the best music. The answer was:—"We do not have any music in church." Somewhat surprised, he asked if no hymns were sung. The person inquired of, responded in the affirmative, but seemed to have no idea that this was music; it was a religious exercise into which music came incidentally, without doubt, but in such a subordinate place as to be hardly regarded for its own sake. "This," says the Musical

Review, very sensibly, "is the proper idea of congregational singing. Music is not the object, but devotion. The exercise must not be regarded as musical, but religious. The most rhetorically eloquent prayers are not necessarily the best, by any means; but, on the contrary, the rhetoric may become a positive hindrance. So with the singing of hymns; that manner which most effectually engages the heart of the congregation is best, though it may lack musical elegance."

TALKING.

I DON'T believe what some folks say, that young persons should be seen and not heard.—I wouldn't have them dumb for anything; but I want them to know how to talk, and when to be silent. I wish I could invent something to put in people's mouths, like what I saw fastened on to a water-pipe the other day. They called it a filter. The water was quite muddy; but when it passed through the filter, it came out as clear as crystal. O! if we could only strain out all the naughty, passionate, careless, silly, and unkind words from conversation, what a pleasure it would be to listen! I'm afraid some people would not have much to say, and I'm quite sure the filter would want cleansing pretty often.

LET PREACHERS WATCH.

THE responsibilities of the ministry are such, that no position is environed with greater seductions to a false life. Ministers are special marks of Satan. Temptations will meet you in every form. The attractions of popular applause, or the honours of mere literary distinction, will be clothed with dazzling power to tempt your ambition. Now, even indolence, or the sordid love of gain, may stand in your path, and breathe over your souls an impure, secularized, selfish spirit. The wrecks of ministerial character lie sadly strewn over the whole course of ages—wrecks, beneath which the brightest hopes have perished.

THE END OF LEARNING.

THE end of learning is to know God, and out of that knowledge to love him, and to imitate him, as we may be nearest, by possessing our souls of true virtue.

ADVANTAGE OF FRIENDSHIP.

A GREAT advantage of friendship is the opportunity of receiving good advice. It is dangerous relying always upon our own opinion. Miserable is his case who, when he needs, hath none to admonish him.

A CONTENTED FARMER.

ONCE upon a time Frederick, King of Prussia, surnamed "Old Fritz," took a ride and espied an old farmer ploughing his acre by the wayside, cheerily singing his melody.

"You must be well off, old man," said the King. "Does this acre belong to you on which you so industriously labor?"

"No, Sir," replied the farmer, who knew not that it was the King. "I am not so rich as that—I plough for wages."

"How much do you get a day?" asked the King.

"Eight groschen," (about 10d.) said the farmer.

"That is not much," replied the King; "can you get along with that?"

"Get along and have something left."

"How is that?"

The farmer smiled and said—"Well, if I must tell you: two groschen are for myself and wife; two pay my old debts; two I lend away; and two I give away for the Lord's sake."

"This is a mystery which I cannot solve," replied the King.

"Then I will solve it for you," said the farmer. "I have two old parents at home, who kept me when I was weak and needed help, and now that they are weak and need help, I keep them. This is my debt towards which I pay two groschen a day.—The third pair of groschen which I lend away, I spend for my children, that they may receive a Christian instruction. This will come handy to me and my wife when we get old. With the last two groschen I maintain two sick sisters, whom I would not be compelled to keep. This I give for the Lord's sake."

The King, well pleased with his answer, said—"Bravely spoken, old man. Now I will give you something to guess. Have you ever seen me before?"

"Never," said the farmer.

"In less than five minutes you shall see me fifty times, and carry in your pocket fifty of my likenesses."

"This is a riddle which I cannot unravel," said the farmer.

"Then I will do it for you," replied the King. Thrusting his hand into his pocket and counting him fifty bran-new gold pieces into his hand, stamped with the royal likeness, he said to the astonished farmer, who knew not what was coming—"The coin is genuine, for it also comes from our Lord God, and I am His paymaster. I bid you adieu."

MATERNAL AFFECTION.

IN view of the sacrifices made by a mother in behalf of her children, how pitiful to see the unfeeling, unkind return too frequently made! A son should, under no provocation whatever, suffer himself to present to his mother a countenance other than wreathed with the sweet smile of affection, or address her with any other than the kind words of love. He should let his right hand forget its cunning, rather than omit to do the smallest kindly duty towards her, and his tongue cleave to the roof of his mouth, before it addresses one unkind word to the ear of her who has felt so many anxieties in his behalf.

Young man! Thy mother is thy best earthly friend. The world may forget thee—thy mother never; the world may wilfully do thee many wrongs—thy mother never; she will cherish thee while living, and weep for thee when dead such tears as none but a mother can weep.

A BOLD PREACHER.

THE boldness of Samuel Davies will be illustrated by a single anecdote. When President of Princetown College, he visited England for the purpose of obtaining donations for that institution. The King (George II.) had a curiosity to hear a preacher from "the wilds of America." He accordingly attended, and was so much struck with his commanding eloquence, that he expressed his astonishment loud enough to be heard half way over the house, in such terms as these: "He is a wonderful man!" "Why he beats my bishops!" &c. Davies, observing that the King was attracting more attention than himself, paused, and looking his Majesty full in the face, gave him, in an emphatic tone, the following beautiful rebuke: "When the lion roareth, let the beasts of the forest tremble; and when the Lord speaketh, let the Kings of the earth keep silence." The King instantly shrank back in his seat, like a school-boy that had been rapped over the head by the master, and remained quiet during the remainder of the sermon. The next day the monarch sent for him, and gave him fifty guineas for the institution over which he presided.

REDEMPTION.

REDEMPTION, O, thou beauteous mystic plan!
Thou salutary source of life to man!
What tongue can speak thy comprehensive grace?
What thought thy depths unfathomable trace?
When lost in sin our ruined nature lay,
When awful Justice claimed her righteous pay,
See the mild Saviour bend his pitying eye,
And stop the lightning just prepared to fly.

FIRE-SIDE RUMINATIONS.

"Whom having not seen ye love: in whom, though now ye see him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory; receiving the end of your faith, the salvation of your souls" (1 Peter i. 8, 9.)

SITTING alone by the fire-side, my thoughts turned upon that part of the passage which I have underlined, "Ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory." I thought this to be a most extraordinary expression, and the more remarkable as the utterance of such a man as Peter; but more remarkable still that it should be recorded in the New Covenant Scriptures, under the inspiration and authority of the Holy Spirit. How many of our brethren are there whose minds are moderately well balanced, who can unreservedly, and without any sense of coming short of the description, adopt and use the language as his own—My joy is a joy that is unspeakable and full of glory? Blessed—yes, thrice blessed—are they who do thus rejoice in God their Saviour, and in their own salvation. Yet it is their privilege, and the state of heart to which they are called; and the Apostle expresses it as the undoubted condition of the saints to whom he wrote. If, then, any among us come short of it, how necessary is it that such should ascertain the cause. I have said "if," for I thankfully testify, that since I have been joined with those who (having received the truth in the love of it) have obeyed the Gospel of God's dear Son in His teachings concerning faith and baptism, I have witnessed the evidences of this "unspeakable" joy. I must admit, however, at the same time, that I do not witness these evidences in all. But when we extend our thoughts to sincere souls among the sects, who, through the teachings of error have not been impressed with the teachings of our Lord, but have been led away from the truth to adopt substitutes for the requirements of the Lord Jesus, we cannot wonder that with them it should be generally found that such expressions as "unspeakable joy, full of glory," and the "full assurance of faith," do not receive from their hearts that ready response, that unclouded consciousness, that full admission, which they would receive if all were right in their spiritual condition. Over all these our souls yearn, and towards them it becomes us to have "bowels of compassion." They are deprived of the richest blessing the Gospel can impart on this side the glorified state. I have said that such an expression coming from Peter is particularly remarkable. If we look a little at the character of this singular man, I think the propriety of this reflection will be seen. We will look at him just now as he is presented to us in the Gospel histories, before he had been endowed, in common with the other Apostles, with the crowning qualification for the apostleship on the day of Pentecost; and I think it will be acknowledged, that he was the very last man amongst them concerning whom it could have been predicated that he would have used such language. He was in an extraordinary degree the subject of impulsive feeling.

So prevalent a feature was this in his character, that it frequently led him into great mistakes, subjected him to severe rebuke from his Lord, and more than once shewed that he was ready to use violence. In all this he then thought he was serving his Master, and proving his own attachment to him. But the comment of the Lord Jesus was, "Thou savourest of the things which are of Satan, and not the things which are of God."

If ready professions, prompt action, physical energy, and bodily strength, could lead to the possession of a "joy unspeakable and full of glory," unquestionably Peter was in the highway for its attainment. But, alas for human nature, the great lesson he had to learn, and which our Lord especially aimed to teach him, was this, that he must entirely renounce this reliance on himself, that Christ might be all in all. Then, and not till then, would he be in a condition to feed Christ's lambs and the sheep of His flock. Dreadful indeed was the evidence he received of this in the denial of his Lord with oaths and curses, notwithstanding the Lord had forewarned him; and sadly must he have recollected his former self when rebuked by the noble and magnanimous Apostle Paul, on his withdrawing from eating with the Gentiles, in deference to the proud Jewish feeling of superiority to the Gentiles, and regard for Moses as being equally to be obeyed with Christ. Yet this is the man who afterwards, in the power of the Holy Spirit, thanks God for that joy which they had through believing, which was "unspeakable and full of glory."

But Peter was now a changed man. He had learned the lesson the Lord Jesus strove to teach him continually, and especially on the solemn occasion of their social intercourse when he had instituted the ordinance of the supper, he most affectingly and persistently asked him three times, "Lovest thou me?"

He had been baptized with the Holy Spirit, and was now converted. He was therefore fitted to strengthen his brethren — qualified to feed Christ's lambs and tend Christ's sheep, as Christ's alone. He now gave to God the Father and Lord Jesus Christ all the glory of all the success he had as a proclaimer and teacher of the Gospel. He was now conducted to the source of that joy which he has so powerfully characterized—a source of joy such as no amount of impulsive feeling could have ever imparted. And what was that source? It was believing in Jesus, the Son of God and Saviour of the world, and "purifying the soul through obeying the truth."

Having thus believed and obeyed by putting on Christ in their baptism, they then and therefore receive the end of their faith, the salvation of their souls. This was the foundation for their "unspeakable joy." They received the remission of their sins and the salvation of their souls, and had assured to them the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, with all the blissful concomitants and results attendant upon a holy life. It follows, then, that the source of "the joy unspeakable and full of glory" is diametrically opposed to impulsive feeling. It comes, or is attained, "through believing." "In whom, (the Lord Jesus) though now ye see him not, yet, believing, ye rejoice," &c. It is not from feelings, but from evidence, this joy must take its rise: the evidence consists in the testimony which God has given concerning His beloved Son; and immersion into the name of the triune God, in obedience to the Lord, that evidence will communicate this perfect joy.

Whatever joy, therefore, is derived from any other source, is unsatisfactory, because it is unsound, being unscriptural, and will of necessity deceive its possessors or its votaries, and lead them away from truth and God. Tried by this rule, what must be our judgment in every case of enthusiasm or of ecstasy? And what concerning the revivals so much in the ascendant in our day? Have we ever known an enthusiast who has not by more or less extravagance proclaimed himself a fool? The reputation that generally he was a good or a wise man, has but served to make his folly and extravagance stand out more prominently. Or, have we ever known or read of an ecstatic, whose ecstasies have not done violence to his nature? Are not both conditions of mind deducible from the passions? Any one of the passions, if not sobered, restrained, and regulated by the belief of Divine testimony, is quite capable of leading on from extravagance to derangement, from derangement to madness. Are not these statements amply illustrated and confirmed by the incidents peculiar to what is deemed religious excitement? Can such means prepare the mind for the healthful reception of Divine truth? Or in any way tend to honor or glorify God? Is not Peter's peculiar failing, viz. a high estimation and confidence in himself, manifest in all this? And by how much this feeling obtains in the mind of an individual, by so much is the knowledge of Christ, the faith of Christ, and the love of Christ, shut out. The professions, and attitudes, and exhibitions—aye, and the offerings, too—of all such are the emanations of an ill-instructed and disordered mind. And will God accept the professions and offerings which are in their character, however they may differ in degree, maniacal or insane? If ministers and others who take part in revival meetings were guided by the Apostle's description of the Christian's holy joy, they would discountenance and dissuade to the utmost from everything that had the least approach to physical excitement, whether of the voice or of gesture, in muscular contortions of the body, as being deceptive and false in relation to the real state of the mind and of the heart.

Such kinds of conversion as are begun, or have their results in rhapsodies or paroxysms of feeling, will eventually die out in conscious shame, which is but another state of feeling, the revulsion of the feelings which they had before. But some perhaps will say—Was not that "joy unspeakable" a feeling? And if unspeakable, does not that embrace enthusiasm and ecstasy in their perfection?

To answer these questions, it is only necessary to refer the querist to the statement of the Apostle Peter: bearing in mind this fact only, that the persons he addressed had "purified their souls through obeying the truth"—that is, they had been baptized into the death of Jesus, in whom they had believed, and had thus "put on the Lord Jesus." He reminds them that "in Him believing, they rejoiced with joy unspeakable and full of glory, and received the end of their faith, the salvation of their souls." Their believing ensured their obedience, and their obedience ensured their joy.

In this process there was no room for rhapsodies or ecstasies. All was intelligence, and a subjection of the judgment and will to the teachings of the Word. The "joy unspeakable" of the Christian is solid and substantial as the Word of God which he believes. It is "the joy that is full," and flows from the belief of those truths which the Lord Jesus had spoken unto them for this very purpose. Possessed of this abiding joy, the believer contemplates with steady gaze continually the glorious truths comprised in the systems of Divine mercy and Redeeming love. His joy comes not in paroxysms, and is not at all dependent on outward means for excitement—it is ever flowing and ever full. It is unspeakable in the sense in which Jesus himself is the unspeakable gift of God. It results from our communion and fellowship with God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ, consequent upon our union to God in Christ Jesus our Lord; and this, as we have shewn, is through believing and obeying Him. Is there anything that is unspeakable connected with enthusiasm, rhapsodies, and ecstasies? In flights of imagination, or of fancy, or of feeling? Unless, indeed, it be their incoherency and vacant or aimless folly. It is a soul-afflicting thought, that mankind generally will seek anything, do anything, substitute anything for the claims of Jesus, rather than seek for this "joy unspeakable," by learning of Him and obeying His word. Why is it that in this life the fulness of the blessings of the Gospel of Peace are not generally enjoyed by Christians? It is because their belief in Jesus is weak. And why is their faith weak? It is because their knowledge of their Lord's teachings is limited. With a contracted knowledge and weak faith, can any thing be more inconsistent with the will of the Lord, than the expectation that their "joy should ever be full," or "unspeakable and full of glory?" May the Lord deliver mankind from the impious practice of promoting means of excitement, under the pretence that they seek to promote His reign in the hearts of their fellow-men! And to Christians I would earnestly say, disconnect yourself from every society or effort, where recourse is had to means for promoting mere excitement, whether physical or mental: for, be assured, there is nothing more calculated to deceive, mislead, and ensnare your spirits. Seek the joy unspeakable and full of glory through believing and obeying the truth, and you will receive the end of your faith—the salvation of your souls, now, at once, and for ever.

THE PLAN OF SALVATION.

MEN are often deceived as to what religion really is. They have a strange feeling in the heart at times which they call religion—an evidence of pardon. This feeling they cannot explain—a feeling nowhere described in the Bible; and I therefore object to it. Some physicians have said it is animal magnetism, or excitement. I shall not attempt to account for it, but I have experienced this strange, unaccountable feeling in my early religious history, and was taught that it was true religion—that I was pardoned. The feeling was always momentary, and as soon as it was gone, I felt bewildered and miserable. I am satisfied that it was all a delusion; for no man can be pardoned until he obtains pardon in the Lord's own appointed way—until he comes to the appointment in which God has promised pardon, bows humbly to his commands, and has the promise of his Word that he is pardoned. No man has any divine promise of the pardon of his sins, unless he has complied with the three conditions of pardon—faith, repentance, and baptism.

Feeling is no evidence of pardon, nor does it constitute the whole of religion. I do not wish to be understood as discarding all feeling in religion, but on the contrary, I maintain that all our happiness lies in our feelings. We are happy because we are pardoned, and not pardoned because we are happy. Feeling is a result, but not an evidence of pardon. The Scripture says nothing about men "getting religion," but in the first chapter of James we are informed that religion is a practice, or what a man does, and not what he gets.

Faith is a very important item in the plan of salvation, but it is not the only condition of justification, as some men teach. "Without faith it is impossible to please God," for he that cometh to him must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him." The Scriptures teach that "we are justified by grace," "by knowledge," "by works," "and not by faith only." If the doctrine that we are justified by faith only is true, the practice of praying for pardon is wrong, for justification or pardon would be obtained by faith and not by prayer, for faith only is faith alone, by itself, without any thing else. And if the practice is right, the doctrine is wrong. The theory that we are justified by faith only—that faith is a direct gift of God, and that a man cannot believe until he receives this direct gift of God, is erroneous. Faith is not a direct gift of God imparted to us independent of the Divine Oracles. We have the testimony or evidence of the Apostles and Evangelists given us to produce faith. Paul says, "Faith comes by hearing, and hearing by the word of God." John says, "These things are written that you might believe." Peter says, "God made choice among us, that the Gentiles by my mouth should hear the word and believe." But thousands there are who neglect the evidences and pray for faith—reject the institution for pardon, and pray God to come down and give some other evidence of forgiveness. With the word of the living God before their eyes telling them, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved," they turn away from this plain declaration, and think to obtain an answer to prayer while neglecting the means furnished for that particular purpose. If faith or belief is a direct gift of God, what is unbelief? It is simply the absence of this direct gift of God. How, then, can the Lord condemn a man for unbelief, when it is simply a withholding on the part of God a direct gift, without which a man can do nothing? The view that faith is a direct gift of God, destroys all idea of blame on the part of the man on whom this gift has not been bestowed, or simply the unbeliever. How could the Divine Being condemn a man because he withheld a direct gift from him, or did not bestow it upon him, without which he knew he could do nothing? Such a thing is preposterous. Faith is an act of the creature—something for a man to do—a commandment. "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved," said Paul to the Philippian jailor. "He that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him." "He that believeth not shall be damned."

What must I do to be saved? We know that we are safe in giving precisely the same answer the Apostles gave to this question. What, then, must a man do to be saved? He must believe, repent, and be baptized. Should you ask me what he must believe, I would tell you that he must believe the gospel. If, still further, you should ask me what is the gospel, I would answer your inquiry in such words as follow: "The gospel is, that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures, that he was buried, and that he rose again the third day, according to the Scriptures." This is what a man must believe that he may be saved. This is the great central truth which the Apostles labored to establish. This is the grand point of every discourse the Apostles preached of which we have an account. The four evangelists, Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, labored to establish the grand proposition that Jesus Christ is the Son of God. And the Apostles were tried, condemned, and punished in almost every imaginable form, for vindicating this proposition; and they all, save one, laid down their lives for this testimony; and not one of them ever recanted. We will now search for the beginning, and see what was done at the beginning. On one occasion the Saviour said to Peter, "On this rock I will build my church." His church could not have been built before he made this statement to Peter, but the building of his church was yet in the future, for he said, "I will build my church." Just before he ascended into heaven, he told his disciples "that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem," and to tarry at Jerusalem until they were endued with power from on high. Thus you see he still points forward to the beginning. Peter, in telling the Jews of his preaching at the house of Cornelius, said, "The Holy Ghost fell on them as on us at the beginning." Here Peter points back to the beginning.

Now, the beginning lies somewhere between Peter's discourse at the house of Cornelius and Christ's ascension. On the day of Pentecost, when the disciples were baptized with the Holy Ghost, and endued with power from on high, after King Jesus was crowned Lord of all, (no king ever begins his reign until he is coronated) his reign on earth begun, his church was established, and this was unquestionably the beginning referred to by himself and Peter. Well, what was done at the beginning? The Apostles simply preached the gospel, which is "the power of God unto salvation." Men heard it, believed it, and obeyed it. They received no persons on trial. They kept no anxious mourners seeking, praying, and agonizing; but all were forthwith shewn the way, and three thousand were added to the church in one day. Every individual who ever came to them honestly inquiring the way to salvation, was told what to do, and did it; and in the same day, or in the same hour of the night, was pardoned and added to the church. "The way is so plain, that wayfaring men, though fools, may not err therein." The Lord says of his system, "He that seeketh findeth." Not an instance is mentioned from Pentecost to the final Amen of the New Testament, of a penitent sinner failing to find his way into the kingdom on the first interview with the preacher.

In reading the Scriptures we have several different answers given to sinners. Paul said to the Philippian jailor, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." Peter said to those on Pentecost, "Repent and be baptized every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins, and you shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit." Ananias said to Saul, "Arise and be baptized and wash away thy sins, calling on the name of the Lord." Here we find three different answers given to inquirers. This must be accounted for in one or two ways. First, there are a variety of ways in which the sinner may come to the Lord; second, the persons being in different positions are answered according to circumstances. We prefer the latter. Let us illustrate: Suppose you were travelling from a certain city, and shortly after leaving town you meet a man, who asks you how far it is to A. You reply, one mile. Passing along you meet another, who asks you the same question. Your reply now is, two miles. Passing still further on, and the question being repeated, you answer three miles. Now, you have given three different answers to the same question. Why did you not give the same answer to the last you gave to the first? Because the persons who asked were in different positions, and you answered them according to their position. Why did Paul tell the jailor to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ? Because he was a Pagan, and knew nothing about the Saviour. And this was not all that was required of him, for he was baptized in the same hour of the night. Why did not Peter tell those on Pentecost to believe, as Paul told the jailor? Because they already believed? When they heard Peter's preaching they were pierced in their hearts. Why did not Ananias tell Saul to believe and repent? Because he had done both, and what remained for him to do was to "arise and be baptized and wash away his sins, calling on the name of the Lord."

Can we be saved without baptism? I know of no place in the Bible where we are taught that we can be saved without baptism; but it does teach that we are saved by baptism, and that we cannot be saved without it. The Saviour said to Nicodemus: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, except a man be born again, he cannot enter the kingdom of God." To enforce this he says, "Marvel not that I said unto thee, you must be born again." He explains born again to be "of water and of the Spirit," and without this, he says, "you cannot enter into the kingdom of God;" and he adds,

"you must be born again." That without which a man cannot enter into the kingdom; and that which the Lord declares must be, is certainly essential. When Saul inquired, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" the Lord answered, "Go into the city, and it shall be told thee what thou must do." When informed what he must do, he was commanded to be baptized. A man would endanger his happiness by refusing to be baptized, just as much as by refusing to obey any other command. Jesus has promised to forgive those who believe on him, complying with the conditions of pardon, and we ought to be willing to receive it upon any terms he sees fit to offer.

The thief on the cross was saved without baptism, says a man. So was Abraham saved without baptism. In the lifetime of the Saviour he prescribed many special laws for special cases, such as the anointing the blind man's eyes with clay, never intended for anybody else. He was the Lawgiver, and could pardon a man upon any terms, as in the case of the thief on the cross, without complying with any conditions, because the general law of his kingdom was not yet made known or published. The Apostle to whom was entrusted the keys of the kingdom, opened a different door to any that had been presented before the day of Pentecost; consequently, if any door were opened before that day, they are not the doors by which we enter the kingdom. The way in which the thief was saved, is not the way that we are to be saved. There is a different plan laid down for us. The Lord has a system, and that which comes first in his system in one case, comes first in all cases. If this be not so, it is no system whatever, and no man can know when he is pardoned, or whether he is pardoned at all.

But why are you so particular about baptism? says a man. It forms the principal issue between us and the parties around us, and is talked of more than any other subject; and for this reason they think we lay too much stress upon it. But we attach no more importance to it than did the Saviour and his Apostles. If baptism is not essential, then the Lord has given a command that is unnecessary to be obeyed. We maintain that it is a command of the Lord, that it is right to obey this command, and that it is wrong not to obey it. It is a positive divine enactment—a visible line that must be crossed to come to the promise. It changes or purifies no man's heart, nor does it change any man's character. But for him whose heart has been previously changed by faith, and thus prepared in mind to enter a new state, and whose life or character has been amended by repentance, and thus prepared in life to enter a new state or relation, in baptism he enters the new state, or is "baptized into Christ," or "puts on Christ." If you believe in the Lord Jesus Christ with all your heart, if you are sorry for having sinned against him, and are willing to forsake your sins and obey him, then you are a proper subject for baptism. You know the Lord commands you to be baptized. You know it is right to obey this command. Can you hope to be saved, if you will not do what you know to be a command of the Lord, and infallibly right? Do what you know to be a command, and then you must be right and safe. When the Lord commands, we are not to inquire why we are to do this or that, but do it. Not because it is consistent with our views of right and wrong; the Lord says it. That is enough. He can command nothing to be done that is not infallibly right. We are safe when we follow him.

The Apostle Peter says, "Baptism doth also now save us." The Israelites were saved in looking at the brazen serpent—Naaman was healed by dipping in Jordan—the walls of Jericho were thrown down by blowing trumpets—and we are saved by baptism—but all these appointments are simply conditions required by the Ruler of the Universe, to test the loyalty of men. He who professes to love the Lord must be tested before he can be received.

When the Israelites were bitten by the fiery serpents, in punishment for their rebellion against God, he told Moses to make a serpent of brass and elevate it on a pole, and it should come to pass that every one bitten who might look upon it should be healed; and it so took place. What was it that effected the cure? It was no virtue in the brass, for that is really poisonous in itself; but it was their obedience to the command of God, in looking on the brazen serpent.

When Naaman was commanded by Elijah to go and dip himself seven times in Jordan and he should be healed of his leprosy, were there any medical properties in the water to heal him? No! for all the lepers throughout the country would have gone there, dipped, and been healed. The cure lay in his obedience to the command of God, based upon his faith in him to effect the cure, when that faith became sufficiently strong to carry him to the Jordan, and cause him to dip the requisite number of times.

When the Saviour spat on the ground and made clay to anoint the eyes of the blind man, and told him to go to the pool of Siloam and wash, and he did as the Lord commanded him, and came back seeing, did the clay and the water of the pool merely open his eyes? Not at all; for the clay would have had the effect of making them worse, and the water of the pool, if possessed of such medical qualities, would have been resorted to by all the blind in Israel, to have their eyes opened. The cure lay in his obedience to the command of the Saviour, based upon his faith in Jesus to cure him. Just so in reference to baptism. The water has no virtue to wash away your sins; but it is the blood of Christ in connection with baptism that washes away the sins of the penitent believer, who, having confessed that Jesus Christ is the Son of God, obeys him in baptism, exercising faith in the promise of God to pardon and accept him as his child, "an heir with God and a joint heir with the Lord Jesus Christ." Jesus shed his blood in order to procure remission of sins, and the penitent believer is baptized in order to come into possession of that remission. The blood of Christ is the procuring cause of pardon, and baptism is the instrumental cause. Sins are washed away in baptism; or else Ananias was mistaken when he told Saul to "arise, and be baptized, and wash away his sins." Baptism is for the remission of sins, or Peter must have been mistaken when he told those on Pentecost to repent and be baptized for the remission of sins. But it avails nothing by itself, nor is there any efficacy in it, except in connection with everything else in the whole system. It is not in the place of the blood of Christ, nor faith, nor repentance; but simply in its own place—the appointment in which the penitent believer enters "into Christ"—"into one body." It is the Lord's appointment in which he says, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." It does not stand by itself, and would be of no value alone, but appears as an item of the divine system, and has the promise of God in it as it stands connected with the whole system. He who strikes it out, or trifles with it, does it at the peril of his own soul.

Indeed, no item of the Christian religion is of any value only in its proper connection with the other items of the same system. Faith by itself, and alone, is dead, and of no value to any human being. Repentance without faith cannot exist. The grace of God, the blood of Christ, faith, repentance, and baptism, are all for the remission of sins, justification, or pardon. Men often dispute about essentials and non-essentials. One man says faith is the great essential—another man, repentance—another man differs from both, and says baptism is the great essential. Let us illustrate this point by a figure. Take a door for illustration. One man says, "The panels are the essential parts of the door." Another man says, "Sir, you are mistaken; the frame is the essential part of the door." Another man steps up and says, "Gentlemen, I differ from both of you. The hinges are the essential parts of the door." Another man says, "Gentlemen, you are all mistaken. The screws are the essential parts of the door." The panels, the frame, the hinges, and the screws, are all essential to the door. Now you may compare baptism to the screws; if you wish; but do not strike it out as a non-essential.

Sectarian preachers now-a-days dare not proclaim what the Apostles proclaimed—dare not give the same answer the Apostles gave sinners. When a sinner comes to a Methodist or Presbyterian preacher, inquiring what he must do, he dare not tell the sinner to “repent and be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins.” If he does, he will lose his office in the church, or he will only escape the fate of others who have tried it. Or, if the sinner believes that Jesus Christ is the Son of God, and has repented of his sins, let him tell such an one, as Ananias told Saul, to “arise, and be baptized, and wash away his sins, calling on the name of the Lord,” and he will be expelled from the church for making so scriptural a reply. He dare not do it. He is pledged to support a human creed, and is not at liberty to follow the truth.

Perhaps you wish to know what I think of the manner of baptizing; as I have said nothing on that point. The Bible says nothing about the mode of baptism; but it does say, “there is one baptism.” That one baptism is either sprinkling, pouring, or immersion. Let every man read his Bible, do his own thinking, and decide for himself what that baptism is. Read the following, which will throw some light on the subject, if anything in the Bible will. “And it came to pass in those days that Jesus came from Nazareth, of Galilee, and was baptized of John, in Jordan” (Mark i. 9.) “Then went out to him Jerusalem and all Judea, and all the region round about Jordan, and were baptized of him in Jordan, confessing their sins” (Matt. iii. 5-6.) “And John was also baptizing in Enon, near Salim, because there was much water there” (John iii. 23.) “And they went down both into the water, both Philip and the eunuch; and he baptized him.

And when they were come up out of the water, the Spirit of the Lord caught away Philip, that the eunuch saw him no more” (Acts viii. 38-39.) “Know ye not that as many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ, were baptized into his death; therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death; that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life.” “For if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection” (Rom. vi. 3-5.) “Buried with him in baptism, wherein also ye are risen with him through the faith of the operation of God, who hath raised him from the dead” (Col. ii. 12.) It is admitted by all parties that baptism is a command of the Lord—that it is right to obey this command—and that he who has been baptized has done right. Immersion is regarded as baptism by all parties. An immersed person is regarded as baptized by all parties. He is satisfied, and his mind is at rest on the subject. He stands upon safe ground—ground that is admitted by all to be right and safe. It is acknowledged by the learned world that the Apostles practiced immersion for baptism. That which the Apostles practiced for baptism is certainly the one baptism spoken of by Paul. It very often happens that persons who have been sprinkled become unsettled and dissatisfied with their baptism, and when about to die, lament that they have not been immersed. How unhappy a man must be who becomes dissatisfied with his baptism, when in the immediate prospect of death. There are thousands of intelligent people who deny that sprinkling and pouring are baptism. Immersion has never been in doubt. Sprinkling and pouring have been in doubt and dispute ever since their early existence. Let us take that about which there is no doubt or uncertainty.

A. H. N.

“We are not weary of eating and sleeping every day, for hunger and sleep revive; without this we should weary of them. And so without the hunger after things which are spiritual, we weary of them too.

Thrift of time will repay you in after life with a usury of profit beyond your sanguine dreams, and the waste of it will make you dwindle alike in intellectual and moral stature, beyond your darkest reckonings.

POSITIVE DIVINE INSTITUTIONS.

UNDER the various economies of heaven, positive divine institutions have ever been institutions of transcendent importance.

THE PROPOSITION, THEREFORE, TO WHICH THE ATTENTION OF THE READER IS INVITED, IS, THAT POSITIVE DIVINE INSTITUTIONS, ARE TESTS OF RESPECT FOR DIVINE AUTHORITY, AND ARE, HENCE, OF FIRST AND CARDINAL IMPORTANCE IN THE RELIGION OF THE BIBLE.

As in every other science, so in the great science of the religion of the Bible, if we would have just views of it, we must commence at the beginning, and acquaint ourselves with its first principles. Be it observed, then, that the universe may be divided into two great empires—those of matter and mind—each governed by laws adapted to its peculiar nature.

In the material universe, which stretches out into infinitude around, above, beneath, every orb of every system is subjected to the great law of the attraction of gravitation, which law is, THAT ALL LESS BODIES SHALL OBEY THE GREATER. In submission to this law, the moon revolves round the earth, and the earth round the sun. Upon obedience to this great law is suspended the fate of the material universe. In a single pound of matter in one of the myriads of systems of which it is composed should rebel, the balance of the whole system of systems would be lost; and unless the disorder were arrested by the strong arm of Omnipotence, all would be reduced to one mighty heap of ruins.

If we pass from the universe of matter into the universe of mind, we shall find one great law governing mind, analogous to that which governs matter. As in the universe of matter the all-pervading and governing law is, that all less bodies shall obey the greater, so, in the universe of mind, the great supreme and controlling law is, that all inferior wills shall obey the greater; rising from the most subordinate will of created intelligences, through the various gradations of the angelic hosts, up to the great central and controlling will of that omniscient and self-existent One, who called the universe with all inferior wills into existence.

As a departure from the great law that governs matter would introduce confusion and chaos into the empire of matter, so a departure from the great law that governs mind introduces disorder and ruin into the empire of mind. We have seen that not a particle of matter is lawless. All was placed under law, that the harmony of the material universe might be preserved; and that the harmony of the universe of mind might be preserved, it was equally necessary that man, and all created intelligences, should also be subjected to law. But sceptics object to the law under which Moses represents God to have placed Adam, as in bad taste with the rest of the story. That he should create the heavens and the earth—fit up the earth like a gorgeous palace for the residence of man, and people it with diversified tribes of inferior animals—should then make a pause in the great work of creation, and after consultation create man in his own image “with reason throned upon his brow,” and the fires of genius burning in his soul-illumined eye—should invest him with imperial sway over the wide-extended earth, and then that he should suspend his destiny upon the eating of an apple, they think ungodly—unworthy alike of Jehovah and of this wonderful child of his love. But it is proposed to show, that Adam's loyalty was put to the most perfect test, a test every way God-like, worthy alike of Jehovah and of one who bears his image bright; while the view of sceptics bears all the marks of human folly.

We have seen it was necessary that Adam should be subjected to law, that the harmony of the moral universe might be preserved. It was also necessary, as a test of his loyalty, and as a tenure of his inheritance. Contemplate him in full maturity of body and of mind, surpassing in all the attributes of genius and talents the most gifted of his sons, opening his eyes upon the gorgeous splendours of a universe all new and glorious, breathing the fragrance and beholding the beauties of the incomparable Eden, with its rivers and brooks, and fountains of water; its green trees, with their fruits and flowers of every variety and of every tint—surrounded by animals of every form and of every colour—by birds of every note, of every wing, and of every plume—view him thus, drinking in happiness from ten thousand fountains, the only anxiety he could feel would be to know how long he was to enjoy it. That he might be assured of this, he must have some tenure of its enjoyment. This he could not have without law. By law comes liberty; and without some such law as God gave to Adam, which contains a license as well as a prohibition, Adam could not have touched even a flower, without feeling that he was trespassing upon the rights of another. Nothing of all that he beheld was his, till bestowed upon him by the Great Author and Proprietor of the Universe. Of the fruits of none of the trees of the garden had he a right to eat, till God said to him, of all the trees of the garden thou mayest freely eat, but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it; for in the day that thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die. The right, now, to eat of the fruits of all the trees of the garden, save that of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, was his, derived by express warrant from the Almighty. But to eat of the fruit of that one prohibited tree, was rebellion—was treason against the supreme majesty of the heavens and of the earth. By that law first came the knowledge of sin, of right and of wrong; and, consequently, freedom of choice between good and evil. For where there is no law, there can be no distinction between right and wrong; and, hence, no freedom of choice between good and evil—and, therefore, no approbation—consequently, no happiness or enjoyment above that of a mere animal and intellectual nature—none of that high moral bliss that springs from conscious rectitude.

Again: where there is no law, there can be no obedience—and if no obedience, no approbation—no approbation, no happiness. 1st, then, law; 2nd, obedience; 3rd, approbation; and 4th, happiness. Perfect obedience results in perfect approbation—perfect approbation, in perfect moral bliss—partial obedience, in partial approbation—partial approbation, in partial and limited happiness. This is a law of mind as immutable as the law of matter which binds the Earth to the Sun. So that God, by giving Adam law, at once gave him freedom and happiness. The fountain, therefore, from which divine law springs, is not justice merely, but goodness. God had one supreme object in view, in placing Adam under law, and that object was human happiness. If he obeyed, his happiness would be complete, and the harmony of the moral universe preserved; if he disobeyed, he brought ruin upon himself, and disorder into the empire of mind. Now, as God is good, he could not but have willed man's happiness; yet neither man nor angel can be perfectly happy without perfect obedience. God must, therefore, require perfect obedience from each.

Sceptics cavil at the idea of suspending the destiny of untold millions upon the eating of an apple (they cannot prove, however, that it was an apple; yet it was some kind of fruit); but that which, to their blinded understandings, seems to be folly, when its philosophy is understood, manifestly bears the seal and impress of wisdom divine. I then affirm, there is no statute or ordinance in the volumes of nature or revelation, that bears stronger marks of Divine wisdom, than does the simple law under which Moses represents God to have placed Adam.

Be it observed, then, that there are two kinds of law; I mean not civil and criminal law—these belong to another classification—but I mean positive and moral law. Positive law makes a thing right by authority; moral law enjoins that which is right in the nature of things. Positive law is right, because it is commanded; moral law is commanded, because it is right. Positive law arises from the will of the lawgiver; moral law from the nature and fitness of things: a distinction as broad and well-marked as any highway in the community.

To illustrate—that children should obey their parents, is right in the nature of things, and therefore it is commanded—that man should shed his brother's blood is wrong in the nature of things, and therefore it is prohibited. But that Abraham should slay his son, was right, because it was commanded; it was made right by Divine authority; therefore, while Cain was wrong in slaying his brother in violation of a moral law, Abraham was right in slaying his son (in a figure) in obedience to a positive law. That Adam should partake of the fruit of the prohibited tree, was wrong, because it was prohibited; it was made wrong by Divine authority. But at the threshold of this argument, to demonstrate the superiority of positive even over moral law: though it is wrong in the nature of things for one person to destroy the life of another—though prohibited by the express law of Jehovah, and though for a father to slay his own son is a deed at which humanity shudders, yet in the case of Abraham it was made right by a positive Divine law!

Man cannot be governed by moral philosophy; he must feel the weight of Divine authority, embodied in the solemn form of law, and clothed with appropriate sanctions, resting upon his conscience, or he cannot be governed. Hence, that God might make his authority respected, he descends upon the desolate summit of Mount Sinai, clothed in awful and terrific majesty. Darkness is his pavilion. Fire and smoke ascend from round about him, as from a furnace. Sheets of blasting, supernatural flame, play in terrific grandeur round the dreary summit of the mountain, which trembles and quakes to its very base, as if awe-smitten at the presence of Jehovah! The dread voice of the Eternal is heard, speaking in awful tones of authority, to the terrified and retreating hosts of Israel; while loud and long resound the pealing notes of a mighty trumpet, as if the God of battles was summoning his heavenly hosts to a dreadful conflict, to crush some revolted province of his boundless empire. The people, overwhelmed with terror and dismay, remove and stand afar off, and beseech Moses that God would speak no more to them, lest they die. But Moses said to them, "Fear not, for God has come to prove you, and that his fear may be before your faces, and you sin not."

But to return: God is about to prove Adam—to test his loyalty. Shall this be done by positive, or by a moral law? Sceptics say it was not God-like to suspend the destiny of man upon the eating of an apple; because in it there was nothing either morally good or evil. But this is the very reason why it was God-like—the very reason which stamps it with wisdom divine. The wisdom of the Bible, like pure gold, shines brighter and brighter the more it is tested. Had God, according to the views of sceptics, suspended the destiny of Adam upon obedience to command, that he should not kill his wife, or upon the observance of any other moral law, there might have been a thousand motives for obedience, without the least sentiment of respect for Divine authority. And had Adam been placed under such a law, and continued obedient, then the angels of heaven never could have known whether he was influenced by love for his wife, or by other moral considerations, or by respect for Divine authority. But God is not guilty of the folly which the wisdom of scepticism would have him to commit. He singles out a case that affords a perfect test of Adam's loyalty. He places him in a garden of delights. Beautiful streams murmur at his feet—the gayest flowers bloom around—birds of the richest plumage pour forth their sweetest melody—animals of every variety gambol about, rejoicing in the sweets of life—the mild zephyrs that sport through this Eden of love are perfumed with the most delicious fragrance: and far and wide all around, stand trees bending with the weight of every variety of the choicest fruits. He has just been invested with the sovereignty of the earth, and now, while standing amidst the surpassing beauties and magnificence of the unparalleled Eden, with everything to excite his admiration, gratitude, and love, God says to him, "Of all the trees of the garden thou mayest freely eat, but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it; for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." Whether Adam will now obey or not is a pure question of will—of loyalty or disloyalty. God just gives him this command, without assigning any reason for the prohibition. And to Adam, no reason apart from the express will of the Divine Lawgiver, could appear, why he should not partake of the fruit of that tree, as well as of that of any other. The great motive, therefore, for obedience, is respect for Divine authority—yet not the only motive. For as the life of Adam would be forfeited by the violation of the prohibition, according to its sanction, confidence in the Divine word would also afford the most powerful motive to obedience. Upon these two kindred motives to obedience, then, the whole Divine prohibition rested and terminated. It is thus that the Divine Father trains his children, and tests their loyalty and respect for his authority, and their confidence in his word.

Analogous to this is the course which parents, to a certain extent, are compelled, by necessity, to pursue with their children, before the dawn of reason. During this period, children can alone be governed by authority; and thus be parents, in the first instance, compelled by the irresistible law of necessity, to pursue a course in training their children, and breaking them to the yoke of authority, analogous to that which is pursued by the Divine Father. And if parents are faithful in teaching their children the great lesson of submission to their authority, before they can understand the reason of the commands which they give them, they will have taught them one of the most important lessons of humanity—one, for the want of which nothing can compensate; and may, afterward, when they deem it necessary, teach them the reason and fitness of the commands which they give them. If children are thus trained to the yoke of authority, they will afterward wear it with ease, and the subsequent duties of parental government will be rendered comparatively light.

But to return. I have said that God assigned no reason for the command which he gave to Adam, but left the whole to terminate upon Adam's respect for the Divine authority, and his confidence in the Divine word. God has thus stamped positive law with superiority even over moral law, in that he has made the former a test of respect for his authority, and, in some instances, of confidence also in his word. But though God has thus stamped positive law with superiority even over moral law, yet there are no essentials and non-essentials in the religion of the Bible. Baptism is a positive Divine institution, and is, therefore, by many, regarded as a non-essential; but if the Bible must still continue to be divided into a chapter of essentials and a chapter of non-essentials, God's positive laws being placed in the one and his moral laws in the other, these chapters will have to change places. God's moral laws have, by many, been regarded as the great essentials in religion, and his positive laws as non essentials; but, according to the views now given, positive Divine laws are, indeed, by Jehovah himself, regarded as of first and cardinal importance in religion, and should, therefore, be so regarded by us. As God's positive laws are tests of respect for his authority, and in many instances, of confidence also in his word, if they be obeyed from the former of these considerations, or from the former combined with the latter, obedience to them will also draw after it obedience to all his moral laws. A man may be moral without being religious, but religious he cannot be in the true Bible sense of the term, without being moral also. He, therefore, who obeys all God's positive laws, out of respect for his authority, or from respect for his authority combined with confidence in his word, will also obey all his moral laws, when to these religious motives are superadded. In the latter case, the moral considerations are respect for the rights and interests of society.

The first four commandments in the Decalogue relate to religion, and it is only with the fifth commandment that the subject of morality is introduced. As our obligations to God are first and paramount to all others, and as religion primarily respects our duties to God, and morality our duties to our fellow beings, religion is justly placed in the first chapter, and morality in the second. I would not disparage morality, nor place it into the shade, but would draw religion out of that darkness and obscurity in which it has been involved, and exhibit it in the light of the Bible, as in the light of the Sun. The essence of religion is submission to Divine authority—obedience to the Lord, for the Lord's sake. This is the reason why a person, who believes with his heart unto righteousness, and confesses with his mouth, that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, is required to bow in humble submission to the authority of the Lord Messiah in the positive institution of baptism. Religion first, and morality afterward. First, obedience to the Lord for the Lord's sake; secondly, for our own sake; and, thirdly, for the sake of others.

But to return. While Adam continued obedient to the positive law under which he was placed, he enjoyed unalloyed bliss; the society and favour of God, with the earth and the fulness thereof, were his, save and except the one interdicted tree, which stood out from all things else as a test of his loyalty, and as a tenure of his inheritance. But, alas ! in an evil hour, he violated that positive law—lost the society and favour of God—lost his Eden—his rich and imperial inheritance, and involved himself and posterity in ruin ! He fell by the violation of a positive law, dragging down with him to ruin all the long line of his posterity. But as man fell by the violation of a positive law, and became an alien from God and an outcast from his presence ; so, by obedience to positive law, under every economy of the remedial system, he has been restored to the Divine favour. Under the Patriarchal and Jewish dispensations, obedience to the positive institution of sacrifice secured to a person the forgiveness of his sins. And under the Christian economy, obedience to the positive institution of baptism secures to the penitent believer the assurance of the remission of all his past sins, through the blood of the everlasting covenant. But here, as in most instances of blessings promised in connection with obedience to positive Divine law, as there is no necessary relation subsisting between the act of obedience and the promised blessing, save that which is established by the positive arrangement of the Divine Lawgiver, the great motives for obedience, as in the case of Adam, rest and terminate upon respect for the Divine authority and confidence in the Divine word.

Now, as the forgiveness of sins is an exercise of the high prerogative of the Executive of the universe, all Christians admit that there must be some particular moment of time when the Infinite extends this favour to the penitent believer. And what moment more suitable, than when he first obeys a positive institution ? As man, by the violation of a positive institution, involved himself in sin and death, what more appropriate than that, by obedience to a positive institution, he should enjoy the forgiveness of sins, and a new life in Christ Jesus—having the prerequisites of faith and repentance unto life ? The forgiveness of one's alien sins, and an introduction into the kingdom of the Messiah here on earth, are suspended upon the conditions of faith, repentance, and baptism ; and the forgiveness of the sins of the citizens of the kingdom, is suspended upon the conditions of repentance and confession. But faith, repentance, and baptism—and repentance and confession—all derive their efficacy from relation to the All-Authority in heaven and on earth, with which the triumphant Messiah is clothed, and to his precious blood, which cleanses from all sin. Man's life in the terrestrial paradise was suspended upon obedience to a positive law. Upon obedience to a positive law, is suspended his entrance into a new life in Christ Jesus ; and his eternal life in the celestial paradise will depend upon his putting forth a hand and partaking of the fruit of the tree of life, which is a positive arrangement, and which will give him the freshness and bloom of immortal youth and vigour !

The Lord's-day and the Lord's Supper are positive Divine institutions, and are standing tests of the loyalty of the citizens of His kingdom, to be regularly observed by them till he shall come again. God has, under every economy, tested man's loyalty by positive law. 1st, There was the positive prohibition against partaking of the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, at the head of the Adamic economy. 2nd, The positive institution of sacrifice, at the head of the Patriarchal economy. 3rd, At the head of the Jewish dispensation, stood the positive institution of circumcision ; and 4th, In the fore front of the Christian economy, stands the positive institution of baptism.

Under the Jewish economy, the positive institution of the Sabbath was a standing test of the loyalty of Israel. So, under the Christian dispensation, the Lord's-day, and the Lord's Supper, are perpetual tests of the loyalty of his people. Every good liege subject of the King, as often as this holy day returns, will, if in his power, observe it to the Lord. But this can only be done by attending to the various observances instituted by the Apostles ; or by observing the day according to apostolic example. For apostolic example is justly considered as equivalent with apostolic precept. The grand items in the public observance of this resurrection day, according to apostolic example, are a steadfast attention to the doctrine or teaching of the Apostles, to the fellowship or contribution, to the breaking of bread, and to prayer. Singing, we learn from other portions of the New Testament, is also another item in the public observance of this holy and blissful day. Every Disciple is bound by his allegiance to King Messiah, to attend every Lord's day to all these items of service, if he has the ability and opportunity. And he who neglects thus to observe the Lord's day, or to attend to as many of these items of public service as he has ability to do, as often as he may, is guilty of disloyalty to the King of Saints.

The rule of contribution is, that every one contribute according as the Lord has prospered him; and if he do it not, but withhold a part, may he not be guilty of acting the part of Ananias and Sapphira? This item in the public observance of the Lord's-day, is the great financial law for replenishing the Lord's treasury; and constitutes, perhaps, the most searching test of loyalty to which Christians are subjected. It sifts them as wheat—it discerns the thoughts and intents of the heart; and in this age of covetousness, many, I fear, are in danger of failing of eternal life, by withholding from the Lord that which is his. If they wilfully absent themselves from the Lord's house on his holy day, they are guilty of rebellion against the Lord who bought them. If they appear, and do not attend to this item of public observance, when they have the ability, may they not be equally guilty of rebellion against the King of kings? And if they contribute, and do it not according as the Lord has prospered them, may it not be, I again ask, with solemn emphasis, that they act the part of Ananias and Sapphira? May the Lord enlighten our understandings.

But to return. Though positive Divine institutions are the best tests of respect for Divine authority, yet no one who reasons correctly upon the great subject of religion, would think of disavowing God's commands either from his promises or threatenings—neither would he think of separating his positive from his moral laws, and of labeling either the one or the other, non-essential. For he who commands us to be baptized, has also commanded us not to steal. "And whosoever will keep the whole law, yet fails in one point, has become guilty of all;" because the authority is the same, and that authority is disregarded if a single Divine law is knowingly violated. All the organs of the human body are essential to a perfect man; but they are not all essential for the same purpose. The eyes, the ears, the hands, the feet, are all essential to a perfect man; but they subserve very different purposes in the economy of the body. So all God's positive, as well as all his moral laws, are essential to a perfect system of Divine government, embracing all man's relations to the universe, to time, and to eternity. The former are essential to test man's loyalty, and to secure the great interests of religion; the latter are essential to secure the rights of man, and to subserve the great interests of society.

But still it is objected, that, though there are no essentials and non-essentials in the religion of the Bible, and though all God's positive, as well as all his moral laws, are essential to a perfect system of Divine government, embracing all man's relations to the universe, yet that the latter ought to have the precedence over the former, because they have for their great object, the security of the rights of man. But against this objection it may be urged, that the great object of the former is to test the man's loyalty, and to break him to the yoke of Divine authority, in order to secure that supreme respect for Divine authority, and that paramount regard for the Divine honor and glory which are due to the Great Author and Supreme Lawgiver of the universe. This great end accomplished, and the rights of man, which have the ægis of God's moral laws thrown around them, are for ever secure. But if the Infinite, through the perverseness of man, fail in this cardinal point, what security can his moral laws afford to human rights?

But again. In obeying a positive Divine law, if we do it from the heart, we are paying direct homage to the King Eternal—but in obeying a moral Divine law, we are discharging a duty to a fellow being; therefore, to give God's moral laws a preference over his positive laws, is to exalt the creature above the Creator—the love of man above the love of God—duty to man above our duty to the great Author of our being—respect for human rights above respect for the Divine authority, honor, and glory. Now if man owes his highest earthly obligations to kind and affectionate parents, surely he owes paramount obligations to God, as his first parent, his highest and greatest benefactor. Piety is the main pillar that supports the temple of morality. Prostrate this pillar, and the temple is leveled with the dust—its columns are broken and scattered around in ruins. Bind man's affections fast to the throne of the Eternal, and they will sweep out and touch with accuracy every human relation; cut them loose from this mooring, and they are adrift on a boundless ocean, for evil or good, as chance may direct.

Thus have I endeavoured to demonstrate that positive Divine institutions are tests of respect for Divine authority, and are of cardinal importance in the religion of the Bible. Let no one, therefore, imagine that any of God's positive institutions may be disregarded with impunity. God has guarded them as with the thunders of Sinai, that no one may presumptuously violate or disregard them, lest he die. Their guilty violators have, in many instances, been visited with the most fearful punishments for their profane and lawless presumption. It was the violation of a positive law that introduced death into the world, and all the untold miseries and woes to which humanity is heir. Nadab and Abihu were destroyed for the violation of a positive law (Lev. x.) It was for tampering with a positive command, by substituting smiting with a rod for speaking, that Moses was prohibited from entering into the land of promise (Num. xx.) It was for violating a positive law, that Uzzah died (2 Sam. vi.) It was for disregarding a positive command, that the prophet sent down to Bethel perished (1 Kings xiii.) For the violation of the positive institution of the Sabbath, the man in the wilderness was stoned to death (Num. xv.) The profanation of the positive institution of the Sabbath, stood at the head of the dark catalogue of sins which God charged upon the Israelites of old, and for which they were driven away captive into Babylon (Jer. xvii. 27.) For profaning the positive institution of the Lord's Supper, by converting it into a Bacchanalian feast, many of the Corinthian brethren were visited by disease, and many by death (1 Cor. xi.)

longer heard on earth, to pronounce the awful doom of death upon the guilty violators of his positive laws; though he no longer smites down with instant death the profane and presumptuous violators of his positive institutions, yet let no one imagine that his arm is shortened, or that his judgments will slumber for ever. Let the Christian take warning by these dreadful examples, that he disregard not the positive institutions of the Lord's Day and of the Lord's Supper, lest he forfeit his celestial inheritance, as Adam forfeited his terrestrial; lest he fail to enter the celestial Canaan, as Moses failed to enter the terrestrial; lest he be visited with death eternal, as many of the Corinthian brethren were with death temporal. Obedience to all God's positive, as well as all his moral laws, can alone secure to any one eternal life.

But disobedience to positive divine institutions has not only been fraught with untold woes to the human family, but obedience to them has been fraught with immeasurable good to man. We have seen that under the Patriarchal and Jewish economies, a person in complying with the positive institution of sacrifice, by presenting his sin-offering according to the divine appointment, had the assurance, from the unerring Word of God, of the forgiveness of his sins. Compliance with the positive rite of circumcision entitled the Israelite to the privileges and immunities of the Jewish Commonwealth. It was in complying with a positive institution, that the Israelites who were bitten by the fiery serpents in the wilderness were healed of the dreadful bite (Num. xxi.) It was in obeying a positive divine commandment that Naaman was healed of the leprosy (2 Kings v.) Indeed, this observance of the positive institution of the Sabbath seems to comprehend in itself the whole duty of the Jewish people, and secure obedience to all the other statutes and ordinances of Jehovah. See Jer. xvii. and Isaiah lviii.

Let the Christian, then, be warned and encouraged, faithfully to observe the positive institutions of the Lord's day and of the Lord's Supper, as well as all his moral laws, that he may inherit eternal life.

But is the reader of this essay a non-believer? And will he, without due examination, reject the Bible, which comes to him with such high claims upon his consideration, gemmed all over with the loftiest thoughts, and the most blissful promises, thick as the skies are with stars? The Bible is the lone star in the heaven of moral night, to guide the weary pilgrim through time's dreary wilderness, to his distant Fatherland—the pillar of fire to guide the Christian host to the celestial Canaan. Blot out the Bible, and the moral heavens are clothed in pitchy darkness, life is a riddle, and death an eternal sleep! No other book assigns to man an origin so high and honorable—a destiny so transcendently grand and glorious. The evidences of its divine authenticity are clear, massy—overwhelming.

But is the reader of these sheets an impenitent believer? I would point him to Calvary, to the dreadful agonies, the divine compassion of the Man of Sorrows, as he hangs there upon the cross, “all mangled and bathed in his own blood.” Hear him cry, in the terrible anguish of his bleeding heart, “My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?” How awfully presses the dreadful burden of the sins of a guilty world upon the innocent Son of God! Again hear him cry, “Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do.”

Sinner, if that scene of love cannot subdue your obdurate heart, you must be damned, for ever and ever. But it may be that you believe, and are penitent for your sins, but cannot see the importance of baptism. And in the light of all the cases which have been adduced, touching positive divine institutions, and the many others which your own reading may supply, are you prepared to reject baptism as a non-essential—to decide as a juror that it is of no importance? Are you prepared, also, to reject the express testimony of the Messiah, and of his apostles and ministers? “Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature; he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved” (Mark xvi. 15, 16.) “Repent, every one of you, and be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins, and you shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit” (Acts ii. 38.) “And why tarriest thou? arise and be baptized, and wash away thy sins, calling on the name of the Lord” (Acts xxii.

16.) “The like figure whereunto even baptism doth also now save us, (not the putting away of the filth of the flesh; but the answer of a good conscience towards God) by the resurrection of Jesus Christ” (1 Peter iii. 21.) Do you still doubt—do you hesitate? Ah! the Lord intends to prove you—to test your respect for his authority—your confidence in his word. He tries all whom he receives. He tried Adam, and found that he neither respected his authority nor regarded his word. He tried Cain, and found his heart full of rebellion and disloyalty. He tried Abraham, as you would try metal in a crucible. He commanded him to take his son, his only son Isaac, whom he loved, and offer him for a burnt offering. Does Abraham demur? No! he had too much respect for the Divine authority, the Divine wisdom and goodness, to ask a reason for the command, though that command was to slay the son of his old age, his only son, whom he loved; that child of many a tear, of many a prayer, and of many a promise! At the command of Jehovah he was prepared to make any sacrifice—to pass through flood and flame; and this is true of every loyal disciple of the Lord Jesus.

I would that you had the faith and loyalty of Abraham; what Divine favours you might enjoy on earth—what royal and eternal honours in heaven! I would that you had the faith of the children of Israel, who were bitten by the fiery serpents, that you might look to Jesus, and be healed of the more dreadful bite of the old serpent—the devil. I would that you had the faith of Naaman, that you might wash in the gospel pool and be healed of the more fearful leprosy of sin. Oh, that you had the faith and loyalty of Saul of Tarsus, that you might arise and be baptized, and wash away your sins, calling on the name of the Lord.

The case is with you, under the dread solemnities of eternal life or eternal death; make up a verdict, that you can, without a blush, hand in to the Lord High Chancellor of the Universe, when he shall take his seat upon the great white throne, and all the nations and generations of men who have lived on the earth shall be gathered before him, to receive from his hallowed lips their last and final awards.

THE LAWS FOR THE CHURCH ARE IN THE NEW TESTAMENT.

CAN we have one single article of faith, or one single by-law, made by uninspired men, and adopt it by our own choice, and still remain the church of Jesus, the Christ? In finding the true answer to this question, let us first look at the church under the figure of a building. We know that if we desire a house to fall into one common heap of ruins, we could do nothing that would effect this more successfully than to dig out the solid rock foundation, and attempt to hold up the building by putting quicksand therein as a substitute. We know that the house would fall. The Lord has said, "Great is the fall thereof." That is, the consequences are extremely ruinous to the house.

In the second place, let us examine this subject by looking at the church as a kingdom. We know that every government has some centre or foundation truth or truths upon which every law, small or great, must be founded. If any of the people should attempt to alter, or in any way change, the foundation truths, would they not be considered as the greatest enemies to the government; for they strike at the very root of the whole kingdom? Or suppose we are under an absolute monarchy, where the government is entirely on the shoulders of the king; and any of us, being his subjects, should, without any authority from the king, meet together to make laws to govern his subjects. If they should make but one law, would not they be guilty of a high crime against the king? And would he say, "Well done, good and faithful servants?" He surely would not approve their rebellious course.

One may say, that while the above is all true, we cannot see how that has anything to do with the question at the head of this article. That you may both see and feel the bearing it has, let us settle what is the great central truth in the kingdom of Jesus the Christ. According to the testimony of Matthew, it is that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God (Mat. xvi. 16.) The Lord said, "Upon this rock will I build my church" (Mat. xvi. 18.) God reserved to himself the right to lay this foundation, for He says, "Behold I lay in Zion for a foundation a stone, a tried stone," &c. (Isa. xxviii. 16.) That God did lay this foundation stone himself, is recorded by Matthew (iii. 17.) There can be no other foundation or centre truth, given by men or angels, to build the temple of the Lord upon; no other can be the centre truth, or truths, of his kingdom (1 Cor. iii. 11, 1 Pet. ii. 4.)

In the next place, let us inquire what is the import of the great truth, that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God. Christ means anointed. We presume it will be admitted that he is anointed Prophet, Priest, and King. As our Prophet, we are to hear him—we are to be his disciples. The voice of a stranger we will not hear; therefore, anything not taught by him we cannot receive. As our Priest, we offer all our requests and thanks to God, the Father, through him. As our King, we look to him for every law to govern the whole kingdom. It is said of him, the government is on his shoulder. We are to go to him for every law, as well as for counsel, because he is the Wonderful Counsellor. If we want peace, he must be our prince, for he is the Prince of Peace.

Now is it not very plain, from these remarks, that if we receive any articles of faith, except the very words of our Prophet, or if we introduce one single law to govern the church, do we not usurp the authority that belongs to the King, and do we not become rebels against the King of kings and Lord of lords? But it may be said, may we not make regulations or by-laws of our own, to conduct the temporal concerns of the church? We have authority for covenants or contracts, but none whatever for making laws. The right to do anything that we do in the church, must be found in the word or law of our King. The law allowing us this authority is what has not been shown, nor can it be, because such a law would violate the centre truth of our religion.

That I am in good company on this subject, I call your attention to the Christian Baptist, p. 415, where Bro. Campbell says:—"I contend that the constitution of the church and its laws are found explicitly declared in the New Testament; and that in all matters of faith and Christian practice, it requires not one by-law to amend or adapt it to any Christian society." ## THE GREAT EASTERN.

BRIGHTLY shone the sun, and the waters of Pembroke dock never looked more beautiful. The light was reflected from one glassy sheet of water, and on either side the green and verdant hills were rich with the corn, the fruit, and the flowers. The heavens were almost cloudless, and all nature, clad in beauty and glory, and animate with hope, appeared to be uttering its song of praise. The wind was hushed, the water calm, the clouds reposing, and the soul felt the influence of surrounding objects, and delighted in the joys of a beautiful morning. The little vessels played and gracefully sported in the waters, while the rapid steamer appeared to be almost instinct with life. Why in them are so many hundreds of persons passing and repassing? And the answer was given, for before us arose in all its stately grandeur and gigantic proportions, the largest ship in the world. Tens of thousands had been to see it—several excursion trains had run for it—the Americans had greatly admired it—hundreds were going with the same object, and so were we. While standing on its broad and spacious deck, and visiting its wonderful compartments, various reflections impressed our mind, which we pen for our own benefit in the future, and for the good of others who may read them.

We thought of the builder. Of him who devised it, and sketched out its bold broad outline—of him who had a view to all its internal arrangements and external adornments. How many days of trouble and anxiety he had! What sleepless nights, what fears and hopes! When difficulties were presented, by his genius they were quickly overcome. He made all the mechanical forces subservient to his will. He had but to speak, and men of mind and scientific research were at command. He devised plans, the execution of which has altered the appearance of some parts of the country, and they will stand as durable monuments of his genius and skill. He filled up the valleys—the mountains were no hindrance to his schemes, and the rapid rivers impeded him not. He summoned to his aid air, earth, fire, and water; and nothing appeared within the range of human conception either too great for him to undertake—or, what is better—too difficult for him to accomplish. Inertia, compression, expansion, pneumatics, hydraulics, momentum, and the mathematics, were among some of the subjects, a knowledge of which was essential to success. To a great extent his plans contributed towards, or directed, the course of trade and commerce. He grappled with material difficulties and conquered them. He was great in his plans, great in his works, and great in the names he employed. The Great Western Railway and the Great Eastern Ship are among some of the wonderful things which stand identified with the name of Brunel. Here, on the deck of this great ship, we behold the ponderous and practical evolutions of his master mind. And we solemnly ask, where now is the man who devised this modern wonder?—where the mind that presided over this noble work of art—this leviathan of the deep? And memory answers, He has gone the way of his fathers. His once robust frame is how mouldering in the dust. His body is with the worms, and over his grave the inspired requiem is sung, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity." We felt the uncertainty of life, and the power of death. What a pity it was, that a mind so rich and fertile, should have been so much devoted to material purposes. It is true, he has left behind him wonderful monuments of skill to perpetuate his fame; and though some of them may stand identified with the moral and intellectual improvement of society, they are but small things for the soul to delight in, when compared with the triumphs of that faith which secures the immortal crown and an eternity of bliss. The poor man earnest in the truth, whose heart is filled with love to God, shall be the instrument of effecting much greater good. It will be his duty and his glory to fight with the weapons which are not carnal, but which through God are mighty to the pulling down of strong holds. His trophies will be of a spiritual kind, and they shall exist through eternity, as deathless memorials of the power of the cross. For when all the works of art shall have crumbled into dust, the stars in the kingdom of God shall shine for ever and ever.

We thought of the first Captain. Poor Harrison ! How strongly his affections were set upon this ship. He had faith in it, and he loved the enterprise. Many were the hopes he entertained, and those who knew him best loved him most. When we trod the deck, and wandered through the saloon and other apartments, our mind reverted to him, and to that fatal morning when his boat was capsized by a gust of wind, and he was precipitated into a watery grave. Quickly through the large vessel a voice mournfully sounded, saying, "Men of the Great Eastern, your captain is dead." The strong men trembled, the tear of affection started to the eye, the bells tolled, and the town was sad. Blessed be God, our Captain can never die. When in the world he walked upon the waves, and said to the troubled sea, "Peace, be still !" He holdeth the winds in his fist, and the sea in the hollow of his hands. His voice hushed the storm, and the raging elements became docile to his will. He now lives and reigns at the right hand of his Father's glory, and of his kingdom there shall be no end. He is the Captain of our salvation, and if we are faithful and true, he will lead us on to victory and eternal glory.

We visited the hospital, and saw a poor afflicted mariner : care and sorrow appeared to be deeply written upon his brow. He looked pale and weak, and was in the act of taking his medicine. We hoped it would do him good, and we regretted that our having unconsciously trespassed there prevented us from speaking to him about Jesus, the Great Physician, and of that precious Balm of Gilead which is a perfect cure for all the maladies of the soul. How many afflicted sailors there are ! What unseen and unknown sufferings many of them endure. Perhaps we do not think enough of those who "go down to the sea in ships, that do business in great waters ; who see the works of the Lord, and his wonders in the deep. For he commandeth and raiseth the stormy wind, which lifteth up the waves thereof. They mount up to the heavens, they go down again to the depths : their soul is melted because of trouble. They reel to and fro, and stagger like a drunken man, and are at their wits end. Then they cry unto the Lord in their trouble, and he bringeth them out of their distresses. He maketh the storm a calm, so that the waves thereof are still. Then are they glad because they are quiet : so he bringeth them unto their desired haven." How deeply ought every sailor to love the Lord ! How great are his dangers—how abundant his mercies ! What have we done for them, or what do we propose to do ? Certain are we that they have a claim upon us, for many are perishing for lack of knowledge.

We examined the machinery. How ponderous it is, and yet how easily controlled. When the power is applied, it appears to be instinct with life. While here we are led to ask, What is the power ? Steam is but the agent. The real power is to be traced to the human mind, without which the fire could not be kindled, the steam could not be evolved, the wheels could not be moved, and the huge vessel could not be controlled. Is is the mind which starts and stops all mechanical motion—the mind furls and unfurls the sails, moves the vast machinery, and directs the course of the vessel. Is it true that mind is the cause of all mechanical power and motion ? Then let us adoringly turn our eyes toward the heavens, there to behold the wonderful mechanism and motion of the planets and the stars. Who called them into being ? Who balanced their forces ? Who gave them motion ? Who created them ? Is it not clear beyond the possibility of doubt, that there must have been mind to set them in motion ? And this admitted, that mind must have been commensurate with the power and wisdom of God.

We looked at the life-boats. All round the great ship are they suspended. They are mournful and elegant teachers. Now how calm and beautiful is the sea. But it is not always so. The sea is the place of storms, of toil, of fear, and strange vicissitude. The life-boats tell me of danger. Within this vessel are the elements of destruction, and without are the influences by which it may be destroyed. The compressed fires may burst, and spread in fury and desolation through all the compartments of this beautiful vessel ; and like another "Amazon," with its shrieking, affrighted, and dying passengers, it may sink into the immeasurable depths, over which it now rides with such graceful ease and glory. Or the dark cloud may lower, the lightning flash, the thunder roll, and the winds with all their fury beat upon her. Her mast may be stricken by the electric flash, and her sails torn to tatters by the blast of the Euroclydon; and, as a last resort, these frail boats upon a wild and friendless sea, may be the only homes of the passengers and crew. In the life-boat there is much, but not absolute, safety. Nothing can be fully depended upon here. But there is a glorious life-boat, which, by the infinite love of our Heavenly Father, was launched upon the wide and troubled sea of humanity. It is the Gospel Life Boat, of which Jesus is the Pilot, into which, if we get, we shall be safe from the power of sin, and from the effects of the fearful tempest of darkness and blackness, and, through divine grace, become heirs of a goodly heritage, and with the prospect of eternal bliss, we shall be safely landed upon the shores of the heavenly Canaan, amidst the welcomings of the saints and the angels, the joy of the Saviour, and the benediction of God.

We passed the wine and spirit bar, and thought of the fearful wrecks which had been occasioned by the influences of intoxicating drinks. Oh! what a sad scene will be presented, when the sea shall give up its dead. May it never be the calamity of this noble and splendid vessel, to be governed by those whose minds may in any sense be clouded by the power of alcohol. It would be a happier day for our sailors, and a safer day for our ships, if no intoxicating drinks were used. We know that hundreds of vessels bestrew the bottom of the ocean, and we forget not the words of the wise man, "Wine is a mocker;" nor those of Paul, who said, "If meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world stands, lest I make my brother to offend." We left this portion of the vessel not with joy, but with sorrow. We thought of the tempest and the blast, of the angry sky and a foaming sea, of the imperilled vessel and of premature death, and of the mad and frantic rush which the poor sailors, in the face of death, make towards the spirit room, where they drink to intoxication before they pass away and are no more seen.

After passing through a variety of places, all of which seemed admirably adapted for assigned and specific purposes, we once more found ourselves on deck, where, mounting the paddle-box, we had a full view of the vessel, and never before were we so impressed with her size. From thence we went to the helmsman's place, and were struck with the admirable arrangement which is made for the steerage of this ponderous vessel. By a slight movement her course is nicely directed. How beautifully is this fact expressed by the Apostle James! "Behold we put bits in the horses' mouths, that they may obey us, and we turn about their whole body. Behold also the ships, which, though they be so great, and are driven of fierce winds, yet are they turned about with a very small helm, whithersoever the governor listeth." Here we are reminded of the importance of little things. Small acts of kindness may produce wonderful results. A gentle word may change a stubborn heart—a trivial sacrifice may turn a foe into a friend. It may kill hatred and create love. A little falsehood (if it be possible for sin to be little) may blight a prospect, and underlie the ruin of body and soul. A persisted falsehood will deaden every spiritual power, and damn the soul. And should there be any who, in such a state of wicked bravery, dare to go up to the table of the Lord, then, in eating the bread and drinking the fruit of the vine in memory of the body and the blood, they are eating and drinking damnation. Let us be careful of little things. The faintest notes are sometimes the most effective. A sigh may speak out the full language of the soul. A blush or a look may belie the utterance. Let us never forget that moral and eternal interests may hang upon our words. An offence forgiven, or a little kindness done, may be fondly treasured in the remembrance of some faithful and grateful spirit through all time, and not be forgotten in eternity.

We noticed the faithful compass, and as we saw the sensitive needle, we thought of the wonderful yet unseen power by which it is controlled. Ride on, noble vessel, thou wilt be guided by the unseen. When mist and sea-fog enshroud thee, when darkness veils the heavens, and no star can be seen, then shall this faithful magnet tell of thy course, and be the means of guiding thee into thy haven. When the beautiful little North pole-star, that heavenly guide to the mariner, is hidden from view, by an influence which no philosophy can fathom, this quivering needle speaks, and upon its teachings depend the safety of the vessel and the lives of the passengers and the crew. But the needle is not always absolutely correct. It is not like the sure word of prophecy—not like the life-words of him who is faithful and true. Even the chart in the vessel may mislead.

Not so with our chart. The Bible shews us clearly the way across the stormy ocean of life, to the holy and the better land. With similar thoughts we left the vessel, but our prayer is that we may never leave Him who stood upon the deck of the ship speaking in parables to his disciples and the people concerning the greatness and glory of the kingdom. ## THE PRESENCE OF GOD.

"In thy presence is fulness of joy" (King David.)

THE phrase, the presence of God, is of frequent occurrence in the Bible—used in different senses and with various modifications.

I. God is present everywhere.

"Whither shall I go from thy Spirit?
And whither shall I flee from thy presence?
If I ascend the heavens, thou art there—
If I make my bed in the abyss, behold thou art there—

If I take the wings of the morning,
And dwell in the extreme parts of the ocean;
There also thy hand shall lead me,
And thy right hand shall hold me"

(Ps. cxxxix. 7-10.)

In every other sense in which this phrase is used in Scripture, there is a corresponding absence. This admits of none. In determining what is meant by the presence of God in any instance, there will be no difficulty in determining the absence, which stands as its contrast.

II. The first man and woman of our race enjoyed the presence of God as none of their descendants have enjoyed it since. God met them and talked with them. Sin afterward entered; and the first thought with the guilty ones was to "hide themselves from the presence of the Lord" (Gen. iii. 8.) But God did again meet them, but only to reprove and sentence. They were cast out of his presence; and there remain their descendants to this day: none enjoy the presence of the first parents. The presence and the absence here, are clearly distinguishable: The paradisiac state, and the preternatural state of the human family.

III. In a modified sense, however, God was afterward present in Adam's family. The altar was erected—the victim bled, and the smoke of burning sacrifice and a plea for mercy ascended heavenward. God blest the Patriarch at the altar, and there too he blest his son, Abel; and he is ever present where he blesses. Cain sinned—he became a murderer. He wandered from the place where the altar stood, and where God was worshipped; and in so doing, it is said, he "went out from the presence of the Lord" (Gen. iv. 16.)

Here the presence and the absence are clearly defined. From this begins a division of Adam's family. There were those who had faith in God and worshipped at the altar. They were the "Sons of God," dwelling in his presence. Then there were those who were mere "children of men," living as "vagabonds," without faith in God, and without a sacrifice to honor him. It was the commingling of these classes which corrupted the whole, and brought upon the world the judgment of the flood.

IV. In the Jewish age the presence of God was in the Tabernacle, and afterward the Temple—in the "Holy of holies," in the Tabernacle or Temple. "There," the Lord said, "will I meet with the children of Israel to bless them." When the Israelites came up to the Temple with their offerings, and to their annual festivals, they came to "appear before the Lord." The place where God was said to dwell, viz.: "between the cherubims," no man could approach, save the High Priest. Israel's approach to God was through a priesthood. This was typical of better things in a better covenant.

For a Jew to be deprived of the presence of God, was to be carried into captivity, or in some way to be deprived of the temple worship. The sins of the Israelites induced the Lord again and again to "cast them out of his presence." The unbelieving Jews have not enjoyed the presence of God for more than eighteen hundred years.

V. The Christian Scriptures reveal a presence of God in Christ:—"God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself." As obedient believers were said to have been inducted into Christ, so did they meet the Father there. And the apostle could fitly say to Christians—"You have come to God, the Judge of all; and to Jesus, the Mediator of the New Covenant." It is in Christ where Christians are made to "sit together in heavenly places." In the "better covenant," the presence of God is not promised at any particular location, as Jerusalem. It is everywhere where obedient believers are to be found—in all places where God is worshipped in spirit and in truth. The new church, built upon Christ, has become the new temple, and the glory of God has come down and filled it. He that would meet the Father, must come to the habitation where he dwells; for, as of old, the "Lord is in his holy temple." "Ye are the temple of the living God," says the great apostle. And again—"Ye are builded together for an habitation of God, through the Spirit."

The Saviour said—"If a man love me, he will keep my words: and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and will make our abode with him" (John xiv. 23.) Under the reign of favour, all are absent from the Lord who obey not the gospel of his Son. They will not come to him that they may have life. It is a sad absence, and one that foreshadows another far more fearful and desolate.

As to how God dwells with Christians, we can define no farther than the apostle expressed, when he said—"Ye are made a habitation of God through the Spirit." The Christian is not in the presence of the Father and the Son as he shall be in the coming day—but the Holy Spirit dwells in him—and the Father and the Son dwell in him by the Spirit.

Though God is present in his church and with all Christians, there is still a near and a closer approach which they can make. None are so much in his presence that he cannot draw nearer. So Paul says to the Hebrew Christians—"Let us draw near, with a true heart and in full assurance of faith." There are an approach to God, and a withdrawal from his presence, just as we worship and conform to the Divine will, or neglect the means of favour. The Laodicean church has become lukewarm. Jesus said to it—"Behold I stand at the door and knock: If any hear my voice, I will come in unto him, and will sup with him, and he with me." No companionship with Jesus is proffered to the negligent, lukewarm professor. "I will dwell in them, and walk in them," is a promise which God makes to his own people; but still, it rests upon this condition: "Come out from among them, and be ye separate, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you: and I will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters saith the Lord Almighty" (2 Cor. vi. 16-18.)

The more that Christians are won from the ways of this evil world, and the more that they are transformed by the renewing of their minds, the more are they in the presence of God. The observance of every means of his appointment brings us nearer. "Draw near to God, and he will draw near to you." In the assembly of his saints, Jesus is ever present. "Where but two or three are met together in my name, there am I in the midst." The social meeting is often neglected by some. Little do they think of Him that has promised to be there! Little do they think how they slight him, who slight his worship! Wherever and whenever, whether in the congregation with few or many, or all alone, God is worshipped with a devout spirit, there is his blessed presence.

VI. Notwithstanding the presence of God in Christ, and the positive, comparative, and superlative of that presence, as it may be enjoyed by the Christian pilgrim, there is a presence of God which so rises above this, that, in the comparison, this presence becomes an absence. So teaches the great Apostle to the Gentiles : " I am in a straight betwixt two, having a desire to depart, and to be with Christ, which is far better " (Phil. i. 23.) He says further— " Therefore we are always confident, knowing that whilst we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord : we are confident and willing rather to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord " (2 Cor. v. 6, 8.) The presence of God, as enjoyed while in the body, is fraught with a " joy that is inexpressible and full of glory ; " but that presence which is enjoyed out of the body, is defined to be " FAR BETTER . " The Apostle is not speaking of the resurrection state : it is the state of being " out of the body. " When he speaks of the resurrection state, he says a crown is laid up for him, which the Lord shall give him " in that day. " He looked to the resurrection for a crown and the inheritance ; but in the state of separate spirits, and with " the spirits of the just made perfect, " he knew there was something " far better " than the present enjoyments of Christianity afforded. It is a gross and most mischievous infidelity which would obliterate from the mind of the Christian this good hope, by teaching him that, after death, and until the resurrection, he is a nonentity, or, but dust and breath. Jesus well knew what is man, when he said—" He that liveth and believeth in me, shall NEVER die. "

VII. And yet the grand climax is not reached until the saints shall enjoy a perfect union with the glorified humanity of Jesus. This will be in the resurrection. " They that sleep in Jesus will God bring with him. " The dead saints shall be raised, and the living saints shall be changed, and all together shall arise to meet Jesus in the air ; and so, says the Apostle, " shall we ever be with the Lord. " It is of this consummation that the Psalmist speaks, when singing of the resurrection of Christ, and catching a glimpse of the " way of life, " which leads to the holiest of all, he closes the song by saying, " In thy presence is fulness of joy : at thy right hand are pleasures for evermore " (16th Pa.) " Fulness of joy ! " There were joys and pleasures in Eden when the first pair walked erect in native innocency ; though fallen, there was a joy of hope which filled their bosoms in believing the tidings of a possible restoration, and as they sought a ray of God's presence at the altar—there were rejoicings among the myriads of the Israelites when God blessed them at his own temple in Jerusalem, where the tribes came up to worship—there are rejoicings evermore in the Christian pilgrim's struggles for eternal life—there is still a higher joy and comfort when he is released from a world of trial and a suffering body ; but the fulness of joy is at God's own right hand, where Jesus the forerunner has gone before us. There is the crown, the inheritance, and the " everlasting kingdom. " There every want is supplied, and no void is left in the bosom.

Now there are cravings in the depths of our spirit-nature which have never been gratified. There is much to please and rejoice the soul in God's service ; but, at last, the higher the attainments, the more is realized from the deep undertones of the spirit. How far short are we of its fulness ; and there is a crying out for the living God ! There is no full satisfaction. There is still a reaching and a longing for a higher presence, and hope whispers, " You shall be satisfied when you awake in his likeness, for in his presence there is fulness of joy. "

The fearful, awful, and eternal contrast with this state, is defined by the Apostle to be, " punishment with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power. " The subjects of this everlasting absence from God are those who " know not God, and obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. " O, that men were wise, heeding the injunction, " Seek the Lord while he may be found, and call upon him while he is near. "

FORGIVENESS.

THE Divine Founder of our sublime Christian system sought, during his earthly ministry, to infuse into the minds of his followers above every other element, the spirit of love ; and his whole life ever exemplified, in beautiful sincerity, the principles he inculcated on his attentive hearers. Nor were those valuable teachings lost upon them. Following him, and listening to his practical life-lessons for more than three years, they gradually so far imbibed his spirit, that in all truthfulness they could boast of being "imitators" of their Lord and Master. And frequently in their epistles do we meet with the very spirit of his early trainings. He inculcated love for enmity, blessing for cursing, goodness for hatred, and prayers for their persecutors; and we have only to refer to the writings of those faithful men, to find, as it were, the very echoes of the Saviour's words. "Love one another," was the great and grand theme of the devoted John, whose life, like his Lord's, was full of love.

There are various and constant occasions in our daily experience for the operation of this spirit of love; yet, while we think of many, as in quick succession they occur to our minds—such as in feeding the hungry—clothing the naked—visiting the sick, the stranger, the imprisoned—relieving the fatherless and widow—the most endearing and God-like manifestation of it is to be found in the beautiful, the sublime art of forgiveness. While ever it remains so obviously true, that "to err is human," we have need to live in the constant practice—nay, in the very atmosphere—of forgiveness. And who will say, that he has attained to such perfection of character and speech, as never to require the extension of his brother's forgiving hand? Who dares to assume, that not in anything does he offend? It is true, we are admonished to guard against giving offences and "occasions of falling;" and we are entreated to be perfect, as our Father in heaven is perfect; yet in him, our Exemplar and Saviour, we have an unparalleled volume of forgiveness.

"The Lord partakes our grief;
He pardons every day."

The climax of his forgiving love is, however, witnessed at the cross, when in the agony of those intense sufferings which the angry Jews inflicted on him he cries, "Father, forgive them! they know not what they do!" Beautiful aspiration!—sublime and unparalleled record, that tells of sins so great, of crimes so base, of murder so foul, forgiven, freely forgiven, by the death of him who, had he so willed, could have avenged his wrongs, aided by twelve legions of angels. Oh! what encouragement for us poor, erring, sinful beings as we are! Was ever love like this! Well might "admiring angels tune their songs," for love so great to a lost world—for "forgiveness sealed by Jesus' blood," to the wretched, ungrateful, unforgiving family of man.

But how fares it with the church of his professing disciples? Come, let us look around, after having first looked at home. How much of his spirit have we first imbibed? Who has drank most deeply sweet draughts of such love and goodness? On whose brow is the sunshine of forgiveness most brilliant? Is it the life-long aim of the disciples in these days to "provoke unto love and good works?" Alas! is it not too true, that in ourselves there is a manifest lack of such heaven-born principles?

Very much has been said and written about Christian union, and the divided state of the professing world has called forth lamentations loud and long; yet, lamentably true it is, we ourselves cannot, and do not, fight hand to hand and heart to heart in the battle for the Lord. Brethren expecting to find perfection in their fellows are disappointed, albeit themselves are often erring. Offences arise, most frequently trivial in the beginning, and quite unintentional; and oftentimes between the nearest and dearest friends. Quarrels and angry words ensue, and, ere long, those who have "lived and loved together," who have rejoiced and wept together, who have prayed and sympathised with each other, by an inadvertent act or word on the one part, misconstrued or misrepresented by the other, are separated; first, there is coolness; next, by evil speaking, extreme distrust is generated; and finally, a great impassable gulf is fixed between them. A few calm words, even the soft answer that turneth away wrath, might have saved it all. Yet many a faithful, long-tried friendship has thus been severed. Hearts, that once beat in unison—beings whose very breath was of affectionate love, never dreaming that the smallest divergence from the exact path of friendly duty would so deeply wound—have thus suffered. "Chief friends" are thus separated on the first suggestions of "the whisperer;" and neither can forgive. Not only is the private circle so influenced, but even whole churches have been split up by this terrible reluctance to overcome evil with good, and to pass over with brotherly kindness the most trifling fault. One member becomes offended, and leaves the church; others, identifying themselves with him, form a separate body, perhaps passing the very door of their former house of worship. They will all kneel before heaven's high throne, and implore the same blessings; yet, wonderful to tell, they will not permit their prayers or praise to ascend under the same roof: and all from an unbending pride, which refuses to overlook a fault, and revolts against the proposal to forgive and forget. Yet probably these individuals will sing with commendable earnestness, although the Saviour's blessed injunction—seventy times seven, as the full measure of forgiveness to be granted—is quite unthought of. Such, we have reason to fear, is but a true picture of the state of many of our churches in this enlightened country.

"Each can a brother's failings hide,

Oh, child of God! — traveller to the land of glory and everlasting rest—oh, Christian warrior, do you not come forth fresh and refreshed from your closet, with renewed ardor for the great conflict, with a heart full of the sweet promises of God, as on bended knee you have had an audience with the Majesty of heaven, who ever invites you, and accords you a gracious reception; to whom, with all your soul's energy and earnestness you have addressed these solemn words, "Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive those who trespass against us?" Unless in mere mockery you uttered those words, your heart should glow with kindly feelings and tenderness for your brother's faults—with pity for his erring nature as for your own—with compassion that seeks no selfish altar—with gentle words of love, and a joyous message to the sinner, which are a sweet echo of your Saviour's words—with forgiveness to all. Forgiveness for all! Is it he whom I thought to be the ungrateful, the envious, the unkind, the false friend, the false accuser? Is it such as these that I am to forgive? Can it be that my Lord requires me to love even these? Oh, yes, even as thou thyself hast just now sought and found mercy! Perchance they, like thyself, were kneeling to seek His favor, who meets all His believing children at the cross, where recording angels witness that He has wiped off this measure of their confessed sin, to be remembered no more; and while as an Intercessor He whispers His mercy in their ear, He says, as their Lord and King, "Go and sin no more." Wilt thou then withhold what He has freely granted? And shall thy brethren in Christ go burdened in mind with the thought of an offended one, whose heart, unlike the Saviour's heart of pity, refuses to forgive?

Alas! that our progress in the divine life should not have brought us all to this eminent stand-point! Happy day, when such it shall be; for then will be done away our strivings and our quarrels, our disputings and separations, our lost confidence and broken friendships; and the time hitherto consumed in these foolish and bitter jargons would be wisely and happily devoted to the true interest of the church, and the amelioration of their condition who are as yet beyond the reach of its benefits. "If ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses." A. Z.

SIN.

1. Sin has its God. After characterizing Satan as "the great dragon which deceiveth the nations," John bears emphatic witness—"all the world * * * worshipped the dragon." And the Scripture expressly declares that Satan is "the God of the world."

2. Sin has its law. Paul speaks of a "law that when we would do good, evil is present with us." That law "works in the members;" and when Christ addressed those who were in subjection to it, he said, "Ye are of your father, the devil; and the lusts of your father ye will do." Inspired writers style that law "the law of sin and death."

3. Sin has its gospel. The old serpent spoke the language of promise in Eden : "Ye shall not surely die." He speaks that language still. He beguiles his dupes, by setting before them, in fair show, "the pleasures of sin;" and hiding from their eyes that these pleasures are but "for a season." Nay, he makes bold with some to give assurance that hell shall not move from beneath to meet them at their coming. And thousands, who have no faith in Christ's Gospel, believe this!

4. Sin has its scriptures. The press groans with works which ignore, or defend, or beautify sin. "It has long been the policy of the devil to keep the masses of the world in ignorance," says one, "but finding at length that they will read, he is doing all in his power to poison their books." And how countless are the books, which a strict justice traces to their origin, in that unholy men wrote, as they were moved by the Spirit of Evil! Such are systems of false and sceptical philosophy—and tomes of history that see no God ruling among the sons of men—and poems and novels that charm the imagination, but taint it; smiting the soul fatally, as with the sun-stroke of genius.

5. Sin has its churches. Assemblies of the wicked, for the purpose of wickedness—may these not be styled "synagogues of Satan?" Sits he not enthroned in their hearts there? And there, is not his will wrought? Oh, it cannot be questioned! Here is one of sin's churches, convened in the theatre. Yonder is a second, gathered into the gambler's den.

6. Sin has its preachers. They preach in the halls of legislation—in private parlors—on the streets—along the by-ways—anywhere—everywhere. They echo sophistry like that of Hume, and ribaldry like that of Paine. They boldly impeach the authority of Holy Writ—or blot from its pages the doctrines which are according to godliness—or extenuate the guilt of fashionable vice—or make pleasure a valid plea for procrastination—or frown away, or smile away, the cross and the Crucified One; now as though these things were an offence, and now as though they were a fable. Some, we fear, have crept into the churches of our saints, and plead more earnestly for "innocent amusements" than for "the work of faith, and labor of love, and patience of hope." Nay, some it may be, are numbered with the ministry of reconciliation—men who immolate charity upon the altar of a half truth—who "fight" for Christ in the spirit of anti-Christ, and abase their brethren, and their Lord's dwelling in their brethren, to exalt themselves.

RELIGIOUS CONTROVERSY.—No. I.

"But foolish and untaught questions avoid, knowing that they do gender strifes. And the servant of the Lord must not strive; but be gentle unto all men, apt to teach, patient: in meekness instructing those that oppose themselves; if God, peradventure, will give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth" (2 Tim. ii. 23, 24.)

WHEN darkness is the only hindrance to progress, the introduction of light is all that is necessary. Analogically when mere ignorance is only the barrier, instruction is all that is required for its removal. Thus, when "darkness was upon the face of the deep," Elohim created light; and when, in Eden, man first gazed, in wonder, upon the universe, God condescended to be his instructor; and, in due time, to test the proficiency of his pupil in the knowledge of the things of nature and of language, in bringing him the beasts of the earth, "to see what he would call them." We may well suppose, that if such pains was taken to communicate a knowledge of the material creation, the far more important truths connected with man's spiritual relations were not neglected. Eve, indeed, appears, from the history, to have comprehended fully the terms and the spirit of the prohibitory test of fealty, and though she was deceived by the false representations of the tempter, we are informed that Adam "was not deceived"—an exemption which can be accounted for only on the hypothesis that he possessed superior knowledge.

The introduction, however, of evil into the world, placed man in a position entirely new. Ignorance ceased to be the only obstacle under an economy symbolized by the tree of knowledge.

It was no longer the opposition of darkness to light, but of evil to good. It was no longer simple ignorance that needed to be removed, but an evil heart and a perverted will that required to be transformed. It was now possible for ignorance to be wilful. It was now accordant with man's state of moral deterioration, that the imaginations of his heart should be evil continually—that he should put light for darkness and darkness for light, and “prefer darkness to light, because his deeds were evil.” Hence, as previously, it had been the work of God to bring light out of darkness, so now it became his glory to bring good out of evil, and to overcome evil with good. It was not now an inert and passive ignorance, that needed only to be informed, but ruinous and active error, that required to be exposed; and it hence became necessary that truth should be urged, developed, and defended at every point, assailed as it has been, from the beginning of the contest, by multifarious forms of error, amidst the changing fortunes and circumstances of the world.

Hence controversy became a necessity. It became also, in this mixed state, a good or an evil, according to its own character and purpose. It might be mere quarrelling and strife—it might consist in “debates about words to no profit, but to the subversion of the hearers”—it might be an idle contention about untaught and foolish questions; or it might be, on the other hand, the sturdy opposition of fact to speculation—of truth to error—of sound reasoning to the false—of the “wisdom that is from above,” to that which is “earthly, sensual, and devilish.” Such controversy as this—a controversy on behalf of truth, carried on by means of truth, and in the love and spirit of truth—is good and proper, and just as necessary, in the present condition of the world, for the welfare and salvation of mankind, as the agitation of the air we breathe is to its salubrity and its purity.

When we consider the vast importance of religious truth, we need not wonder that Christianity has been, from its origin, a theme of perpetual controversy. It was born, nurtured, and developed amid debates; and has been defended, sustained, revived, and restored by controversy. Ever making its appeal to reason, and addressing itself to man as he is, it necessarily elicits inquiry, and calls into exercise his powers of perception, reflection, and judgment; never proposing to accomplish for man what man may himself accomplish, and never releasing man from the responsibilities which rest upon him as a being capable of comprehending and receiving truth. Thus, even in the days of inspiration, it was only “after much discussion” that the Apostles and Elders at Jerusalem reached the just conclusion which emancipated the Gentiles from the yoke of the Mosaic ritual. Thus, also, it was through Paul's debate at Ephesus, protracted through two years, “in the school of Tyrannus,” that “all they that dwell in Asia heard the word of the Lord.” Hence, the beneficial results of the labours of the Apostles everywhere—labours which consisted in a continual conflict with Jewish prejudices, and misconceptions of the Law and the Prophets, and in exposures of the gross and senseless idolatries of the Gentiles. Hence, too, the benefits we largely derive from the apostolic epistles, which abound in connected and elaborate trains of reasoning—in exposures of dangerous errors, doctrinal and practical, and admonitions against these in the various forms which they assume among men.

If we do not find, in the discourses of our Saviour, so much of the controversial element, it is because it was the peculiar province of the Great Teacher simply to enunciate those great fundamental truths and principles, which it became afterwards the duty of the apostles to elaborate and defend. He became, therefore, the “Light of the world”—a Divine Instructor, speaking as no man ever spoke—“a Teacher sent from God,” speaking God's words as the means of man's spiritual enlightenment and salvation. Nevertheless, even in his case, we find that the necessity for discussion or controversy was not wholly wanting. It was he, who, when only twelve years of age, seems to have employed the Socratic method with the Doctors in the temple. It was he who put the Sadducees to silence by means of simple but irrefragable arguments, drawn from the facts and truths of the Scriptures. It was he who hesitated not to unveil the hypocrisy, and to expose the false reasonings, and worldly views and principles of Scribes and Pharisees. And if he was thus often compelled to employ the logic of controversy, and to endure the "contradiction of sinners," we need not be surprised that the ministry of the apostles was so much occupied with discussion, or that it should have been urged as one of the important qualifications of an overseer, that he should "be able by sound doctrine, both to exhort and to convince the gainsayers," and to "stop the mouths" of "unruly and vain talkers and deceivers." But it is unnecessary to press this matter, which must be clear to every reflecting mind. Who does not know that all the great reformers of the world were controversialists, and that they encountered and overthrew evils of their times with the weapons of logic and of truth? Who does not see the necessity of controversy from the simple fact, that even the question, whether controversy is necessary or not, is one that can be decided only by means of controversy?

While, then, discussion is thus to be regarded as lawful and necessary, it may become either a good or an evil, according to the nature and circumstance of the case. The objections which are so often made to controversy, are founded upon its abuses. Needless and accrimonious debates have brought discredit upon controversy in general, and led many to denounce it altogether, as though they could secure truth in an unquestioning and lifeless inactivity, or gather up the pearls of knowledge upon the sandy shore, without having the trouble to buffet the waves of the ocean or penetrate into its dangerous depths.

That much of our religious controversy is, in fact, needless, cannot be truthfully denied. An excess here, is, indeed, to be constantly apprehended, from the very constitution of man himself, presenting, as he does, so many points of diversity, and manifesting so strongly, and so universally, the disposition to contend. When Basil Hall called to see Napoleon at St. Helena, he interested the Emperor greatly in giving him an account of a visit he had just made to some of the South Sea Islands. Among other things, he related to him that upon one of these islands he found the people utterly destitute of any kind of weapon. "How, then, do they fight?" instantly inquired Napoleon, much surprised, and quite incredulous that any people could be found on earth who did not fight. Nor was the judgment and experience of this acute observer at fault, for, at least, in a wider sense, there are none who do not fight. Disagreement and contention in some form exist everywhere. If a war be for a time suspended in the tented field, there is seldom, if ever, an armistice in the political or the religious contest. Religion, indeed, has almost always been a principal element in wars. Its introduction among men could not, with such beings, fail to give rise to contention, and this was so fully anticipated by the founder of Christianity, that he himself declared that he had not come "to send peace on earth, but a sword." Such, then, being the natural tendencies of things, and such the foretold results, it is important to guard against any needless argument or controversy, either by the introduction of unprofitable questions, or by an undue persistence and earnestness in regard to such as are lawful.

To determine when a discussion is proper or improper, is often a point of considerable difficulty; yet it is one which it is often highly important to have decided, in view of the peace of religious society—a peace which is ever to be diligently sought, though it can of course be permanently secured only beneath the reign of purity and of truth. It is the determination of this important question which constitutes the ground-work and the primary and original object of the religious reformation for which we plead, and a clear understanding upon this subject is, therefore, essential in the case of every one who is sincerely desirous of promoting the beneficial objects of this movement. It appears to me, however, from the revival of questions long since fully settled—the introduction of speculations which were to be wholly repudiated, and the laboured effect made by some to occupy the attention of the brotherhood with untaught questions and "debates of words"—that the distinction between matters of faith and matters of opinion, so distinctly drawn in the beginning, has become effaced in the minds of many, and that it may be advantageous, at the present moment, to consider this distinction, with special reference to some of the issues now pending amongst us.

THE RESTORATION OF ISRAEL.

WITH many, the return of the tribes back to the land of their fathers, is but a myth. There is no divine warrant for such a conclusion : so I thought, and so I reasoned, but it was for want of a purer light or clearer view of the Divine Oracles. It is now a Divine faith ; God has said it ; it will and shall be verified. A few facts or statements only, can now be given in support of its truth.

1. The land of Canaan, with its special boundaries, was given to Abraham and his seed for an everlasting possession.

2. Balaam was directed to say of them, "From the top of the rocks I see him, and from the hills I behold him : lo, the people shall dwell alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations" (Num. xxiii.)

Their entire history verifies this declaration. Napoleon Bonaparte tried to settle them in Paris and France in 1806, and though large promises were made of special favours, God had said nay, they shall not be "numbered among the nations."

3. Jeremiah thus wrote of them : "For I am with thee, saith the Lord, to save thee ; though I make a full end of all nations whither I have scattered thee, yet will I not make a full end of thee : but I will correct thee in measure, and will not leave thee altogether unpunished." Again, He will finally "restore them," and punish all their oppressors, and "Jerusalem shall be rebuilt" (Jer. xxx.) The 31st chapter is also full of his promises to return, and it would seem to be almost impossible to read carefully Zechariah xiv. and Ezekiel from the 31st chapter, without having a clear conviction of its truth.

The New Testament will furnish its proof. Our Lord, in describing the destruction of Jerusalem, and the sore punishments to come upon the nation, gives a limitation to their desolation—"And Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, (how long ?) until the fulness, or the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled" (Luke xxi. 24.)

It would appear that God's wrath is now poured out upon them in vindication of his promise, by Moses (Deut. xxviii.) There is, however, a time coming when their mourning shall be turned into joy. Paul may also be heard in their defence : "Now if the fall of them be the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles, how much more their fulness ? For if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be but life from the dead ?" It is also expressly said, that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in ; and also, "that all Israel shall be saved" (Rom. xi.)

In view of such facts, Paul exclaimed with admiration, "Oh ! the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God : how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out !" (Rom. xi.)

It is clearly stated in Ezekiel that God will gather both Judah and Ephraim, or the ten tribes, again, and make of them one nation, to be ruled by one king. In his 36th chapter, God promises for them a new heart and a new spirit ; in the 37th, he compares the whole nation to a valley of dry bones, but that they shall live again : "Say unto them, thus saith the Lord God, behold I will take the stick of Joseph, which is in the hands of Ephraim, and the tribes of Israel his fellows, and will put them with him, even with the stick of Judah, and make them one stick, and they shall be one in my hand ; and say unto them, thus saith the Lord God, behold, I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen whither they be gone, and will gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land ; and I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel ; and they shall be no more two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all."

No period in their past history can answer to the above statement. No union of the twelve tribes has ever taken place. God says that they shall be converted and never again separated, and that David, in Christ, shall be their king ; and that the "heathen shall know that I, the Lord, do sanctify Israel when my sanctuary shall be in the midst of them for evermore" (Ezek. xxxvii.)

says that the first mention of them in England was in A.D. 740. During the reign of Richard, in order to avoid cruel and shameful treatment, they took possession of the castle, and finally destroyed themselves, their wives and children, to the number of 500. In 1210 he caused all the Jews to be seized, and their goods to be confiscated.

When Henry III. was upon the throne, the Jews were more kindly treated, but were required to wear two stripes of cotton as a mark of derision ; but he too soon robbed them of their wealth. In 1291 they were banished from England, and the edict of Henry IV. lasted about four centuries, and no Jew could visit England except at the risk of his life.

Lord Cromwell was petitioned by many persons in England to allow them to return, and though he was in favour of it, the people rebelled. They were not allowed to go back until Charles II. Since that they have been in England. In 1753 a bill was carried through Parliament, naturalizing the Jews who had remained three years in the country without an absence of over ninety days. It was sanctioned by the crown, but public sentiment forced its abandonment. What do we now find to be their condition ? They have one of their men in Parliament, in despite of all prejudices ; and, over-ruling all law against it, God is working now in their favour. "God moves in a mysterious way." His hand, though unseen, is nevertheless occupied in their favour. As he raised up Cyrus to destroy Babylon, without his knowledge, so is he now at work disposing the nations to remember Israel and Judah, the seed of Abraham. The great work began visibly in the nineteenth century. The Emperor Francis I. of Austria ; the Grand Duke of Baden, in 1809 ; the Duke of Mecklenburg, in 1812 ; the King of Bavaria, in 1813 ; issued ordinances, admitting their Jewish subjects to civil rights ; so has the late King of Prussia.

In 1832, Mehemet Ali took possession of the Holy Land, and allowed them to live in it ; and it is said, that from ten to forty thousand settled in Hebron, Tiberias, Saphat, and Jerusalem. What is now their condition and prospects ? The indications of their return to Jerusalem are really astounding, as the following statement from the newspapers will indicate :—

RETURN OF THE JEWS TO PALESTINE.—To the student of the Bible and church history, there are few current subjects of more absorbing interest, or deeper significance, than the events now almost daily transpiring, which point to the repossession by the Jews of their own land. The tide of progress, after a lapse of centuries, may be said to have fairly turned in that direction ; and the prayer long offered by that chosen, but now scattered people, that "Judah may be saved and Israel dwell securely, and that the Redeemer may come to Zion," is undoubtedly hastening to fulfilment. The Sultan of Turkey is encouraging Jewish emigration to Palestine, and is offering to sell them as much land as they choose to buy, and it is said has even expressed his willingness to dispose of the Mosque of Omar to them, which, it will be recollected, stands upon the very site of the Jewish Temple, on Mount Moriah. This mosque is one of the Mohammedan's most celebrated shrines, being scarcely inferior, in national importance, to those of Mecca and Medina. Politicians and statesmen look upon these indications as a legitimate consequence of the liberalizing influence of Mohammedan intercourse with Christians, and so they may be ; but to the reader of the yet unfulfilled pages of Revelation they also point to what, as it respects the Jewish nation, "prophets and kings" have long waited for, "but died without the sight." That the Mosque of Omar should be in a fair way of passing into the hands of the people to whose fathers the site on which it stands was once given in an everlasting covenant, is what no reader of secular history, fifty years ago, could even have dreamed would ever come to pass. Some of the hills around Jerusalem have already become Jewish property, and it is by no means improbable that some of the present generation will see the entire city of Jerusalem again in the hands of its ancient owners. That mighty revolutions will follow in the wake of such an event, is probably as certain as that the Jews will return at all ; at all events, affairs in that immediate region of the East must ere long become an engrossing theme among the nations of the earth. An able discussion of this vast theme, and the steps towards the fulfilment of prophecy as they transpire, will constitute a prolific field for the religious press ; and those evincing the greatest familiarity with the subject, will doubtless find their enlightening disquisitions sought after with avidity. The foreign correspondents of those journals would do well to give particular attention to this subject. The Presbyterian of the present week alludes to it, and promises more in the future.

Great events are at hand—God is shaking Italy to its centre. The “Man of Sin” is in agonies. The people are aroused, and the “smoke of her torment” is now ascending high over all the world. Even the False Prophet has loosened his grasp over the Holy Land, and the Jews are invited back to its consecrated spots, its holy places. The great river Euphrates is fast drying up, and even the Mosque of Omar, which has been so long consecrated to Mahomet, it would appear, has been tendered to the sons of Abraham. Can this be true? It is a marvellous interposition of God in their favour. Thank God that we have an able missionary in Judea, whose whole soul is full of love for Israel. The Gospel, with its power, is rapidly preparing the world for great changes. Speed on its progress, thou mighty Conqueror, until all shall own thy reign.

G. W. ELLEY.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

THE nineteenth century, though little more than half run out, will prove one of the most remarkable in the history of the world. As distance grows, many of what are now considered its great events will fade on the eye, like mountains afar off, and at length sink out of view. Time will fill up the letters which the sword has carved; new revolutions will throw down the barriers of existing empires; and some centuries hence the world will retain no trace of many who are playing the chief parts on its stage. The men who have immortalized themselves and their times, are those who, amid the din of machinery, or in retreats remote from the bustle of camps, the intrigues of courts, and the noisy combats of public assemblies, have studied the arts, not of war, but of peace.

When the world has lost almost all of Wellington but his name, James Watt will live in his inventions. His genius will continue through untold generations to subdue the soil and triumph over the sea—to employ the hands and fill the mouths of millions. Among many peculiar features of our age, one of the most remarkable is the expansive and the comprehensive character of its benevolence.

Our grandfathers, or great grandfathers, though good people, were content to live to themselves. Their religion was contemplative rather than active. To live a holy life, to rear a virtuous and pious family, was the height of their ambition. Their sympathies were confined to a circle so narrow, that they remind one of the story told of an honest countryman, who, away from home, attended worship in the church of the parish where he happened to be. The preacher was a great orator; the audience was moved to tears—not so the rustic. He sat hard and stolid as the bench beneath him, and replied, when asked how he could sit unmoved by such a flood of pathos, “Oh, you see, I don’t belong to this parish.”

In olden times, what did not belong to the parish, the neighborhood, or the family, excited little interest. With exceptions hardly worth mentioning, the churches of Christ did nothing for the conversion of the heathen, either abroad or at home. Though there are now five vessels belonging to Missionary Societies sailing about their work in the Pacific Ocean alone, formerly no ships left London, Liverpool, Glasgow, or any other port, with missionaries among their passengers, and Bibles part of their cargo. Foreign, Home, City, Medical Missions; Sabbath Evening, Apprentice, Adult, Factory, and Ragged Schools; Bible, Tract, Pastoral Aid and Total Abstinence Societies: these and many other such are the growth and glory of our age.

Thus while the Sciences and the Arts have made unparalleled progress since heads now grey were black, and grown men were boys, the church has not lagged behind. Pressing forward in her high career, she has kept abreast of them in the race.

Another remarkable feature in our era is the acknowledgment and practical application of the power of union: of coöperation, as better than individual action. Separate the atoms that form a hammer, and in that state of minute division, they would fall on a stone with no more effect than snow-flakes.

Weld them into one solid mass, and then swung round by the quarryman's brawny arm, they descend on the rock like a thunderbolt.

Stand by the falls of Niagara, and as the waters, gathered from a hundred lakes, are rolling with the voice of a hundred thunders over the rocky precipice, fancy them divided into their individual atoms. They might gem with sparkling dew-drops vast tracts of field or forest; in clouds of gold, and amber, and purple, they might hang curtains around the gates of day; but where were the onward, overwhelming power of the majestic flood? Gone; and gone the vaunt with which a New Englander met the boast of a Neapolitan during a brilliant eruption of Vesuvius. The poor Italian had the glory of Vesuvius if he had nothing else, to boast of in his priest-ridden country. Directing the attention of his companion to the mountain as it shot up showers of fiery stones, and licked the sky with long tongues of flame, and poured streams of glowing lava down its riven sides, he exclaimed, "You have nothing like that in your country." "No," said the other, with a nasal twang, but thrust sharp and quick as a rapier's, "yet I guess we have a bit of water that would put it out in two minutes." Now as it is with the combined power of matter, so it is with the combined power of men. They do in masses what they would not attempt, or attempting, could not achieve as individual units. Bravely and gallantly as our soldiers fought at Waterloo, I doubt if there were twenty men on that field who would have stood up singly for seven long hours to be shot at like targets; yet, massed in solid square and column how they stood! From morning to sun-down facing the foe, and budging not a foot, till night crowned their brows with victory! The wise man says that "two are better than one;" and our Lord illustrated the advantages of union when he sent forth his disciples two by two.

OPEN COUNCIL

LETTER FROM A. CAMPBELL.

Dear Brother Ainslie,—My wife solicits me to write you a few lines—a few words of congratulation at the success of the good cause—the cause of all causes the most interesting to the enlightened Christian: the progress of the original gospel amongst our contemporaries. In looking over the last Harbinger from England, we are quite exhilarated with the progress of the apostolic gospel in the Old World—especially in England and Scotland. It is indeed to us a cause of thanksgiving to the God of all grace, for his abundant goodness and grace vouchsafed to our brethren, through whose instrumentality so much has been achieved. We are indeed exceedingly gratified with the prospects before you from the past. From so many centres the light must shine more and more abundantly. We thank and bless the Lord for his abundant goodness and grace vouchsafed to the pioneers in the great work in Great Britain.

May the God of all grace continue to bless your labours in his vineyard, and multiply the fruits of your works of faith and your labours of love in his cause and kingdom.

In this New World its career has been to us truly wonderful. We have, through his grace, a rich and splendid harvest in our horizon. Sectarianism is annually losing its influence and power, and manifesting its weakness to withstand our plea for the restoration of primitive Christianity. It loses in every conflict which it creates. The let-alone policy is being annually more and more recommended by the more discriminating parties in the field. But this policy makes still more for the truth than against it, so that the sectaries are at their wits end. It is the Lord's doings, and wondrous in our eyes. The demand for labourers in the Lord's vineyard is, notwithstanding the hundreds now employed, waxing greater and greater every year.

Bethany College is being rebuilt on a large scale, and when completed, will be the finest and most capacious, and indeed the most splendid college edifice in the United States. About one half the building will be completed this year. Its entire front will be 420 feet, and its materials are of the most enduring quality. The architects say it will be the most splendid edifice in the United States. We will have in all respects the most capacious and permanent edifice in the Union. It is altogether the Lord's doings, and wondrous in our eyes. We send out annually some thirty evangelists into the field. But I am compelled to close.—In the hope of immortality, your brother in Christ,

TEACHING CHILDREN TO PRAY.

SOME person called my attention to a letter addressed to me in the May number of the Evangelist, by a Brother "Missouri." This Brother "Missouri" has the advantage of me. I am out in these open and broad prairies, where he can crack at me under my proper signature, and without anything to shield me from his galling fires, and he is hid in the hazel-bush, or timber, under an assumed name, where I cannot hit him. I always like to see the mark or the game that I crack at. I never like to shoot in the dark. Nevertheless I will take one random fire at Brother "Missouri." Brother "Missouri" is in the dark, and doubts as to the manner of training children, it seems. "Some thinking it no harm for their children to attend dancing-schools, ball-rooms, shows, theatres," &c. If he means by some, the people of the world, I have nothing to say to them; their course is consistent: all of a-piece, whether they are trained in the schools of the Devil, or in some of his other schools, such as card-tables, race-fields, ten-pin alleys, saloons, gambling hells, &c. But I protest against any man nick-naming himself a Christian, who trains his children in the above schools of the Devil, or who has anything to do himself with such training, whether as pupil or teacher. Any Brother or Sister who permits his or her children, or the household over whom they have control, to visit such schools, ought first to be admonished and faithfully dealt with; and if he or she will not desist from such an anti-Christian course, he or she ought to be separated from the congregation by the knife of discipline. "Abstain from all appearance of evil;" withdraw yourselves from all such, for they serve their appetites, the flesh and the Devil, and not God. What concord has light and darkness? What concord has Christ and the Devil? What agreement has the temple of the Holy Spirit with idols? Come out from among them—be separated—touch no unclean thing. Be not conformed in this world—you cannot serve two masters. Christ will not have a divided empire—he will not be served by halves. When the Devil finds his pupils in his schools, he has a right to claim them, and take them when on his territory. Every master and owner has a perfect right to his own servants and property—and so has old master Diabolos. Give the Devil his due, we say; do not rob even the Devil.

But Brother "Missouri" wishes to know if my father taught me "to pray before conversion and obedience," and is it the duty of a Christian to teach an unconverted child to pray? I answer at a venture, yes. My father taught me to pray both by his own example, in morning and evening devotions, and by precept. I thank him for it. So did my mother and grandmother teach me. So have I taught my children, and so has my wife taught them. I once returned home early in the morning. When I came in sight of the house the doors were closed; no one could be seen. I feared they were sick. I opened the door, and found my wife and children at prayer. I was greatly delighted. I joined with them. I wish all Christian mothers would do the same; for in this way did the Jews train their children. Read Deut. vi. 4, 5, xi. 17, 25. Study these chapters. Also Josh. 23rd and 24th chapters:—"As for me and my family, or house, we will serve the Lord." Read 1 Samuel. i. ii. The great and good men and women among patriarchs, Jews and Christians, and the great and good among old and modern reformers, were thus trained. For what should children pray? Pray to God to keep them from evil. From evil men and the devil. To direct their ways. "In all thy ways acknowledge him, he will direct thy paths" (Prov. iii. 6, 8, 17.) Pray to him for all we need. Pray to him for more faith—"Lord increase our faith"—more light, more grace; for all the blessings of this life. Moses, old Judge Samuel, and King David, Paul and Timothy, Cornelius, and John the Immerser, were thus trained. You say, "Pray for pardon of sins?" The creeds all say children have no sins in the plural, only one sin in the singular number, and therefore they need not pray for what they have not—sins. The gospel teaches men to believe, repent, and be immersed, for the pardon of sins (Luke xxiv. John xx. Acts ii. 38.) To use your language, there is "no harm" to pray for pardon of sins. But after you have said, God be merciful to me, a sinner—after confession and repentance, "arise and be immersed, and wash away your sins." Do you pray with and for your children every morning and evening? My sheet is full. Farewell, Brother "Missouri."

PRIMITIVE METHODIST BAPTISM.

BEING on a friendly visit, I availed myself of the opportunity, on the evening of the 9th, of hearing a sermon by a Primitive Methodist itinerant minister. After which a child was brought forward to be baptized, (christened) when the minister remarked, that "It was very unlikely that all should think alike upon the subject of baptism; that it was his opinion the time never would come when all would be agreed upon it." He also said, "There are many thousand persons in the world, and no two of them think precisely alike; and as our difference in features does not unhumanize us, so our difference in opinion on the subject of baptism does not unchristianize us. It is a subject concerning which we should learn to bear and forbear." He added, "There is nevertheless something to be learned in baptism. It is designed to teach you (referring to the audience) more than this child; like all other ordinances, it is designed to teach us something about God, and to teach the parents of the child their duty to train it for God." He was very careful to impress upon our minds that it was a non-essential ordinance, and that to view it as being necessary to salvation, was to detract from the blood of Christ. He took the child into his arms, and sprinkled a few drops of water on its face, saying, "I baptize thee, in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost."

John the Baptist baptized in Jordan and Enon, because there was much water there. The Eunuch went down into the water, and came up out of it; but now half-a-pint of water in a basin is sufficient to baptize numbers." Jesus said, "He that believeth and is baptized, shall be saved." When the Eunuch asked, "What doth hinder me to be baptized?" Philip replied, "If thou believest with all thine heart, thou mayest." Now faith is altogether out of the question, our moderns having found out (to them) a more excellent way.

Allow me to ask, "By what authority doest thou these things, or who gave thee this authority?"

JAMES LEAVESLEY.

LETTER FROM AUSTRALIA.

BEECHWORTH, Victoria, Aug. 22, 1860.

GRACE, mercy, and peace be with you, and all who love the Lord Jesus Christ. I have no doubt but that my dear brethren at home and elsewhere, will always feel interested to learn of the progress of the truth in this far distant and important part of the world, particularly as a gold field, where the minds of men are so apt to be carried away in search of the uncertain and fleeting riches of the world. I purposed writing you more frequently, but our progress as a church has been so slow, I had nothing very cheering to communicate, and therefore I preferred being silent. But I have now the pleasure of informing you, that the cause of our dear Redeemer is beginning to prosper in our midst. Two young men, natives of Germany — Bro. Beck, from Hamburg, and Bro. Schlosser, from Hanover — made the good confession of the name of Jesus by immersion a fortnight ago. They are both very intelligent and pious young men, who were led to our little meeting-house by the simple means of distributing the Christian Advocate on Lord's day; so, although we may not have talents to proclaim the Gospel publicly, we may all do something to advance the Redeemer's kingdom, should it only be in distributing tracts. Our young German brethren feel very desirous to spread a knowledge of Primitive Christianity among their own countrymen, and Bro. Beck has written to a Baptist minister in Hamburg about getting some German tracts sent out. I am hopeful that as the good seed is sown amongst our numerous German population, glorious and rich harvests will be gathered in to the praise and glory of God and the salvation of souls.

We had also the pleasure of receiving into our fellowship last Lord's day, a sister newly arrived from England. We number now 16 members, and some who lately witness our order will, we trust, put on the Lord Jesus in the appointed way laid down in His Word.

Owing to the migratory nature of our population on a gold field, a number of brethren who have met with us are now scattered over the colony again. But I am happy to inform you, some of our brethren residing at Chittin new gold-fields, fifteen miles distant from Beechworth, now meet every Lord's day to break the loaf. Oh! how much reason have we to thank God and take courage. For nearly two years my partner in life and myself could meet with only one sister to hold fellowship with us. We knew the cause was the Lord's, and we realized his promise, "Wherever two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst." We regret the removal of our esteemed Bro. Hutchinson, son of Bro. Hutchinson, of Dumfries. He is still in the district, and we may see him occasionally, but, for the present, he is deprived of the inestimable privilege of meeting with brethren on the First Day, to observe the institutions of the Lord's house, and to build each other up in our most holy faith. I beg to unite with many of my brethren, in expressing my gratitude to our Heavenly Father for the recovery of your health, and I pray that you may be spared for many years to labor in the vineyard of the Lord. What a glorious hope we have, if faithful unto death. These vile bodies of ours shall be fashioned like unto the glorious body of Christ, and shall wear a crown of glory that fadeth not away. But my sheet is full. I must bid you for the present adieu! Yours in the hope of the Gospel,

JAMES INGRAM.

THE GOVERNMENT OF THE CHURCH.

A MUCH-esteemed correspondent and sister in the church of Christ writes as under:—"Divisions among brethren are great stumbling-blocks to the world and to young converts. If what is called the one man system in church government is wrong, certainly a democracy is ten times worse, and opposed to all growth in the body of Christ. It strikes me, that the elder's office is not understood. It has become merely nominal. With whom is the ruling power deposited? Is it with the people and young converts in their ignorance? Or where is it? Do point it out to us."

The above interrogatories, it must be admitted, are pointedly placed before us, and certainly they are of so much importance, and involve consequences so serious, that satisfactory replies cannot be given to them without reflection. The church of Christ is not a democracy in the sense in which Webster defines it, viz. a form of government in which the supreme power is lodged in the hands of the people collectively, or in which the people exercise the power of legislation. Such a form of government, as we know from history, has obtained both among the ancients and moderns; but legislation of this character, or indeed of any kind, is not required, and cannot be admitted within the church of Christ. Jesus, when arraigned before Pilate, emphatically declared, "My kingdom is not of this world;" and he subsequently added, "All authority in heaven and on earth is given unto me." Here the government of Christ's church is clearly laid down, for he ascended up on high, and took his seat at the right hand of the Father in heaven, when the angelic hosts were commanded to worship him. Jesus, therefore, is the only Saviour, Ruler, and Lawgiver in His church. Now it must never be forgotten, that the laws of Christ are supreme; they extend even to the secrets and motives of the hearts of all those who are truly converted to him. We have this plainly stated in Jeremiah xxxi. and Hebrews viii.—"I will put my laws into their minds, and write them in their hearts—I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people. They shall no more teach every one his brother, saying, Know thou the Lord, for they shall all know me from the least unto the greatest of them, saith the Lord; for I will forgive their iniquity, and their sins will I remember no more." In these we have portrayed, then, the subjects of whom Christ's kingdom is composed, or his church on earth, in whom, and over whom, Christ, as the anointed of the Father, is to dwell and reign for ever more. This he does by his Word, and through his Spirit, which, in the first instance, was promised specially to his Apostles, and to his faithful followers who were found collected in an upper room in Jerusalem on the first Pentecost after his ascension. Having thus seen who is the Legislator in the church, we will next endeavor to ascertain with whom the government of the church on earth is deposited, and the manner in which it should be exercised. ### THE "CALL" OF MINISTERS.

Do you consider that ministers are called, or have a special call, as did those to whom allusion is made in Gal. i. 15, Heb. v. 4, Rom. x. 15?

The disciples of Jesus are all called—"called out of darkness"—"called in one hope"—"called with a holy calling." And Simon, surnamed Peter, addressing the brethren, says to them all, "As you have received the gift, so minister." A special call to enable a brother to be liberal, would be as needful as a special call to qualify a brother to be a speaker. Gal. i. 15 refers to the apostleship which was given to Paul; and Heb. v. 4, with its connections, compares the old and new high-priesthood, and has not the slightest reference to the position, office, or work of any man in Messiah's government. As to Rom. x. 15, there is no call either mentioned or implied. D. O.

THE HOLY SPIRIT

Will you let us hear from you on this topic, namely, Do we in saying the Holy Spirit is God, speak intelligently and in accordance with the Oracles of God?

The expression, "God the Holy Spirit," is frequently employed; but this form of speech was coined long after the entire Oracles of God were given to man. To "speak as the Oracles," is very different from speaking in this style. An Apostle has declared, that "God anointed Jesus with the Holy Spirit;" but to put this in the modern language which is now so repeatedly employed, and say, "God anointed Jesus with God the Spirit," would be much more in accordance with the oracles of some sections of Hindoos, than with the Oracles of God. Such an expression, therefore, as the one to which our querist refers, is not in accordance with the Oracles of God. D. O.

THE SPIRIT OF WORSHIP IN ALL AGES: being Thoughts on Worship and Ordinances, commended to the Prayerful Consideration of all Christians. By One who seeks to find in all some Points of Union in the Tree of Life.

SUCH is the title of a pamphlet which has been sent to us for serious consideration, and which truly deserves investigation on the ground of its own merits. It is evidently written by a devout and gentle-minded man, who empties upon us no vials of wrath and malediction, but who blows through a silver trumpet, in calling us to follow on towards the deeper and higher life in which he certainly believes. He has an eye for the perception of spiritual good, wherever such fruit is made manifest, and in such a field we have no desire to be behind him in the recognition of things which are true, pure, and imperishable. In faithfulness, however, to the cause of God and of truth, it will be necessary to expose some principles in his development, which are as far removed from sound Philosophy, as they are from ancient Christianity, and, by consequence, perilous to the well-being of man, present and eternal.

The errors of this writer are all the more likely to prove seductive and ensnaring, owing to the sweetness of his spirit and the blandness of his voice; but though the nightingale should sing to us from the hemlock bush, or the branches of the deadly night-shade, we must not be led by the melody to feed upon the poison. Our author rightly begins by speaking of worship as the recognition and adoration of the Eternal One, and as the sequence of faith; and then he thus proceeds:—"But faith is based on revelation, and is indeed so intimately connected therewith, that in one sense, the spirit of faith and of revelation may be said to be one and the same thing; for faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God; and whether we regard this as spoken of the outward word, or of that MORE INWARD WORD wherewith God speaks to us by his Spirit in the heart, the consequence is equally the same." As Baron Cuvier or Professor Owen could tell from a single bone the structure and habits of the animal to which it belonged, and determine the age in which it lived—so from the "more inward word" of our author, we can ascertain the school to which he belongs, and the pasture in which he ruminates. This, however, shall not prejudice us against anything which he has been moved to deliver.

I. We have some acquaintance with the divine Logos, the everlasting Word, which was from the beginning with God, and which in the fulness of time was made flesh and dwelt among us, that we might behold his glory, the glory of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth, shining into the moral darkness of this world with true, essential light from the countenance of God. And we know that a time is coming, when the same Being will appear in righteousness, the faithful and true one, with his eyes as a flame of fire, and on his head many crowns. As he proceeds with his armies in the work of retribution and recovery, it will be seen that he wears a vesture dipped in blood, and that his name is called the Word of God. We acknowledge him as King of kings and Lord of lords, having indefeasible right to all sovereignty and dominion in the empire of nature and the kingdom of grace.

II. We have some acquaintance with the testimony concerning him, the Word which is incorruptible seed, which liveth and abideth for ever. "For all flesh is as grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of grass; the grass withereth, and the flower thereof fadeth away; but the word of the Lord endureth for ever, and this is the word which by the gospel is preached unto you." We have some knowledge of this glorious Gospel of the blessed God, made known to all nations for the obedience of the faith—first spoken, then written, and preserved to us inviolate in its integrity by the gracious providence of God. It has lost none of its ancient power in the revolution of the ages, but with the majesty of age has still unimpaired the freshness and bloom of youth. Given by divine inspiration, it is still able to save our souls, and build up the child of God in maturity and elevation of character.

III. We likewise have the privilege of knowing something by faith and deep-rooted consciousness of that Holy Spirit, the Paraclete, the Comforter. Through the sublime and significant media of fire-like tongues and rushing wind, the invisible Spirit came down to energize the body of Christ, and fill with life divine that temple, the stones of which were quarried from the ruins of our nature. It is the privilege of each obedient believer to have that Spirit bearing witness with his own spirit to the fact of sonship and final inheritance; and it is our happiness to know, that "if the Spirit of him that raised up Christ from the dead dwell in us, he that raised up Christ from the dead, will likewise quicken our mortal bodies by his Spirit which dwelleth in us."

Of these three things we know something (though, alas! far too little); but of the author's "more inward word," to speak theologically, we know nothing, and wish to know nothing. It is an alien, with neither manly voice nor honest face; and whenever it gains an entrance into any house, it leads away the inmates from their moorings amid solemn realities, into the shadowy land of dreaming mysticism, where the richness of life is wasted among phantoms.

Our author then proceeds to consider the history of Cain and Abel, looking on their offerings as the first recorded acts of worship in holy writ. "Cain's spirit was not accordant with his offering, the bent of his mind was not towards God, his heart was not right in the sight of God, and therefore God, who seeth the intents of the heart, accepted him not. Abel's spirit, on the contrary, was inclined towards God, not only at the time of his offering, but previously, and probably to a great extent uniformly; the state of his heart was fairly and correctly expressed, and represented by the deportment of his worship, and on that ground God accepted him, and testified that his life pleased him. We are too apt to look upon the offering of Cain and of Abel as that one act in their lives which was pleasing or non-pleasing to God: whereas the acceptance and non-acceptance on the part of God was nothing more than a sequence—a consequence of the previous spirit of their lives for probably a considerable time. And it was not merely because one brought of the firstlings of the flock, and the other of the fruits of the ground, they were either accepted or rejected, for it is most likely that each brought of the best of his individual possessions, intending to shew thereby the greatest mark of external respect; and had Cain's spirit or life corresponded with that act of worship, there can be no doubt that God would have accepted his offering equally with that of Abel, though it differed in kind." In a foot-note our author concedes that the spirit of faith in Abel led him to select a lamb as the most appropriate sacrifice he could offer, in the shedding of whose blood he might have seen a type of the future sacrifice of the spotless Lamb of God on Calvary. There never was a worse managed case, and our author, notwithstanding the boldness of his affirmation, shews some faltering by the character of his foot-note. The only lesson which he deduces from the history is this—that we have in the account the characteristics of true and false worship, the difference only lying in the fact, that the one was an ungodly man, the other a holy one; therefore, the blessing and the curse. Some of our readers will be much inclined to smile over the discovery made by the writer. He has arrived positively at the conclusion, that the worship of ungodly men is not acceptable to God; but that if they draw near to him with their lips, while their hearts are far from him, they will only receive condemnation. This is unquestionably true, but surely not original, and it was scarcely worth while to announce it so gravely among people already in full conviction. We have never met with a professing Christian who would break a lance in controverting such a statement. It does not, however, follow that the writer has correctly perceived the true state of the case in the difference between Cain and Abel. On the contrary, his affirmation that Cain would doubtless have been accepted had he been a righteous man, notwithstanding the character of his offering, is a very dangerous statement, being equally false and unreasonable.

ceptable way of approaching the Holy One. There must by moral necessity have been teaching from heaven on the question. And indeed holy scripture does not leave us in ignorance on the matter. It says, "By faith Abel offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain, by which he obtained witness that he was righteous; God testifying of his gift: and by it he being dead yet speaketh." Faith must have testimony to rest upon, and it is thoroughly manifest that Abel rested with child-like simplicity on the testimony of God—not making a selection, as our author imagines—but reverently following the prescribed method. Cain, the "will-worshipper," made a selection, approached the Lord as if man and nature remained in their primal state, as if there had been no actual ruin, and no prospective redemption. No righteous man, in the Bible sense, could have brought such an offering; neither could it have been acceptable to God, if he had possessed the holiness of a saint, and the brightness of an archangel. His offering might be gathered living from the soil, and be fresh and fragrant with the dew of heaven upon it, but the "will-worshipper" could not be justified. The result was condemnation, followed by sullen rancour, by consuming hatred and malice, by murder, remorse, and the life in death of the outlaw and vagabond.

The second part of his work proceeds to review the moral history of those Gentile nations mentioned by Paul in his Epistle to the Romans. Thus he delivers himself:—"It is indisputably clear also that this law, now referred to, was not only orally or traditionally handed down from one to another, but that it partook also of an 'inwardly imparted character,' and was in fact an internal manifestation of the grace and spirit of God revealed to each, and capable of being honored or despised by each: hence, 'Because that which may be known of God is manifest in them, for God hath shewed it unto them.'" Again, "For when the Gentiles which have not the law, do by nature the things contained in the law, these having not the law are a law unto themselves, which shew the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness, and their thoughts the meanwhile accusing or else excusing one another.'" Our readers will perceive from this extract, that the inward word has come back again. Ah, sirrah!

I. Perhaps we can get further into the matter by inquiring into the condition of these lost and God-abandoned nations, somewhat more carefully than our author has done. It is a great mistake among the half Deists who teach Natural Theology, to suppose that man in entire ignorance of the invisible world, would gradually find out God by his own researches. It would be an endless sail on a black river, spirit calling upon spirit, and god upon god, without any final satisfaction or solid resting place. But the Godhead never laid upon man such tremendous labor, or sent him on such an awful journey. In the beginning he walked and talked with man as a Father with his child, and afterwards secured by the longevity of the Patriarchs the accurate conveyance of the holiest divine traditions.

II. Besides the authoritative and impressive teaching of venerable men, there was the standing witness of Creation, the visible harmonies of nature always bearing testimony to eternal power and Godhead—not of an originating kind—that was not required; but powerful, varied, and affluent in giving strength and confirmation. Notwithstanding the strange howl of the Atheist, we feel deeply in this antechamber of the Eternal, that our dwelling-place, roofed over with stars and ramparted with rocks and mountain bulwarks, was not built by the devil or any infernal god. It is with its spreading corn-fields, and waving forests, and rushing rivers of life and fertility, so thoroughly adapted to the physical, mental, and moral nature of man, that we cannot help feeling that man and the great house came from one benevolent Author. Though nature is sometimes darkened by storm and eclipse, and mutters or thunders with penal voices, yet the broad impress of beneficence is in the structure, and in the wonderful provisions.

III. There was the consent of their own understanding, which is formed by God for the perception and reception of truth, the temple of the human spirit being adapted for the kind of service which is to be celebrated in it. During what may be called the war of the giants, while our English philosopher Locke was shaking down the hoary fortress of innate ideas—and the great German Leibnitz was endeavouring to defend it—Locke insisted that there was nothing in the spirit which had not passed through the senses, and Leibnitz replied that there was nothing in the spirit save the spirit. A curious phrase, but still full of meaning. The men were both right, each from his own stand-point. Man has such a determinate peculiar nature, that he can deal with facts in a way which is impossible to the other beings and things around him. There is no disorder in the solar system or stellar worlds, because material things simply obey the iron impulses of necessity or force impressed upon them from the beginning. The birds and brutes made to be taken and destroyed, obey an instinct somewhat finer, but equally blind. But man, the free agent in the image of his Creator, occupies different ground. There is a spirit in man, and it is the spirit of the Almighty which giveth him understanding. There is kingship in his constitution, in his power of marshalling facts, and arising up into the knowledge of laws and principles.

Hence these people under consideration being human beings, must at one time have given their consent to the great spiritual reality which they afterwards wished to forget. The knowledge of God was conveyed by tradition—testimony from father to son—supported and ratified by the power and benevolence shining in Nature—consented to and endorsed by the understanding, the conscience, the moral nature of man. "Deep called unto deep"—grand old voices, like choral harmonies, made sublime music for God, and confluent rivers of heart-shaking testimony rolled in one direction. Notwithstanding all this, when the people's hearts were darkened by the love of sin—the practice of unrighteousness—they forsook God, and He gave them up to their own depravity and delusions. The consequence was, a state of things dreadful beyond all adequate conception. But notwithstanding all this, our author's more inward word quite slips away, so that we are not able to hold it. Let us try if we can find it in the elements which make up by their union what we call conscience.

I. Man is evidently separated from, and distinguished above the beings around him, by his power of perceiving moral law, and feeling that he is under moral government.

II. He has both the power and the habit of trying himself and others by the moral law which he recognizes, and of forming estimates and moral judgments concerning the nature of action.

III. He has a susceptibility of painful or pleasurable emotion consequent upon the judgments which he forms.

These simple elements form that composite power which we call conscience. There is in this way built up in the soul of man an invisible judgment seat—a solemn, secret, and dread tribunal, where man often trembles at his own bar. Many a poor wretch, vainly flying over deserts and continents in search of peace, finds all his labor vain, for he carries with him that mysterious tribunal from which there is no escaping, and the judicial process is for ever going on. But still we discover nothing of this more inward word, for be it borne in mind, that a man's conscience is not always a safe oracle, but is regulated by the faith and knowledge of the individual; and both these may be dwarfed and sullied by weakness and superstition.

We recommend our author, as he is evidently a man of leisure, to look into a wonderful book—the "Holy War" of John Bunyan. There he will discover that after the great Prince Immanuel had reconquered the famous town of Mansoul, he confirmed my Lord Understanding, the old Lord Mayor, in his former office; but Mr. Knowledge became Recorder of the town, in room of Mr. Conscience. "Then did the Prince call the old gentleman, Mr. Conscience, who formerly had been the Recorder of Mansoul, and told him that as he was well skilled in the law and government of the town of Mansoul, and was also well spoken, and could pertinently deliver to them his master's will in all earthly and domestic matters, therefore he would also make him a minister for, in, and to the goodly town of Mansoul, in all laws, statutes, and judgments of the famous town of Mansoul. And thou must, said the Prince, confine thyself to the teaching of moral virtues—to the civil and natural duties ; but thou must not attempt to presume to be a revealer of those high and supernatural mysteries that are kept close in the bosom of Shaddai, my Father, for those things knoweth no man, nor can any reveal them but my Father's Secretary only." Thus speaks the fine old Baptist, and he well knew what he was writing about. Unless the great Secretary, the Holy Spirit of God, reveals to him in his living word the things which belong to God and the eternal state, Mr. Conscience, who has no inward light on such matters, will lead us into all sorts of mire and pollution, without any feeling of remorse. Before we dismiss Mr. Conscience, we may once more address him in the language of the old author : — " Wherefore, Mr. Conscience, although I have made thee a minister and a preacher to the town of Mansoul, yet as to the things which the Lord Secretary knoweth, and shall teach to this people, there thou must be his scholar, and a learner, even as the rest of Mansoul are. Thou must, therefore, in all high and supernatural things, go to him for information, for though there be a spirit in man, this person's inspiration must give him understanding. Wherefore, be humble, and remember that the Diabolonians who kept not their first charge, but left their own standing, are now made prisoners in the pit ; be therefore content with thy station. I have made thee my Father's vicegerent on earth in the things which I have mentioned before. And take thou power to teach them to Mansoul, yea, and to impose chastisements upon them, if they shall not willingly hearken to thy commandments. And, Mr. Recorder, because thou art old and feeble, therefore I give thee leave and license to go when thou wilt to my fountain, and there to drink freely of the blood of my grape—for my conduit doth always run wine."

Even so ! And by that bright fountain, that precious wine, we will try the remaining portion of the writer's pamphlet. "To the law and to the testimony : if they speak not according to that word, it is because there is no light in them."

In the third division of his work, our author proceeds to review the time when Christ came into the world, and nailed to the cross the ordinances that were against us, establishing the New Covenant. But surely the author is aware, that up to that time the old ordinances were most solemnly binding. All kinds of temporal ruin, by fire, by famine, by war, and by judicial death, came on the chosen people when they departed from the appointed temple service, or from any of the statutes of God. Perfectly true it is, that such service was hateful in his sight, if rendered by men whose hands and hearts were unclean with blood, robbery, and licentiousness. But as we have already intimated, there is no true service rendered by insisting so much upon a matter which all grant by heart and by speech. Our author refers to the fact, that some portions of the Jewish law were given on account of the hardness of their hearts, and he argues from that, if we had more preparation of heart, and lived more closely in communion of spirit with God, the less need there would be of external rites and ceremonies whereby to approach unto him ; and he finally draws the conclusion, that the necessity of ceremonial worship arises from a corresponding departure in spirit from the living God. Alas ! with what confusion even good men are environed in this imperfect state. There is a measure of truth in the statement of our author, but such a narrow and limited range of vision, that he seeth not whether his reasoning would lead him. Yes, dear Sir, departure in spirit from the living God rendered all the external ordinances necessary — not merely Baptism and the memorial Supper, but likewise the more sublime ordinances with which these bring us into contact. The incarnation — God manifest in flesh — was an ordinance or appointment of God, rendered necessary by the departure of the human spirit from the living God. So was the Great Expiation, by which guilty man has reconciliation and redemption. So was the resurrection of the Holy One from the prison of the grave, when he was declared to be the Son of God with power, and gave proof that he was the resurrection and the life. And there are in Germany many theologians who occupy ground similar to that occupied by our friends at home. They assume the same standing in reference to Incarnation, Atonement, and Resurrection, which our English mystics assume in reference to Baptism and the Lord's Supper, viz. regard to these ordinances is no longer necessary to the salvation of man. They have, in common with our English friends, discovered some transcendental method of rising from the ruins of the fall, and modes of holding fellowship with God, better than those which he in his wisdom appointed. Which of them stand in the greatest danger, it is impossible to say, for all these great realities, whether they be the ordinances which rendered salvation possible, or the ordinances by which we enter into the enjoyment of that which has been procured, have come to us on the same divine authority — are delivered to us in the same Canonical Book—attested by the same monuments and seals.

Let us glance at a few samples of divine teaching on these respective points. "Who being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God : but made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men ; and being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow : of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth ; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father" (Philip. ii.) — "Know ye not that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ, were baptized into his death ? Therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death, that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life" (Rom. vi.) — "So the antitype baptism doth also now save us : not the putting away the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ" (1 Pet. iii.) — "For I have received of the Lord that which I delivered unto you ; that the Lord Jesus, the same night in which he was betrayed, took bread. And when he had given thanks, he brake it and said, Take, eat ; this is my body which is broken for you : this do in remembrance of me. For as often as ye eat this bread and drink this cup, ye do shew the Lord's death till he come. Wherefore, whosoever shall eat this bread, and drink this cup of the Lord unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord" (1 Cor. xi.) Can any human being assign a reason why we should receive the Apostle's teaching on the Incarnation and Passion, and reject it on Baptism and the Supper ? How very solemn is the ground which the Apostles occupy, for the One who had all authority given to him said, "He that heareth you, heareth me ; and he that despiseth you, despiseth me ; and he that despiseth me, despiseth him that sent me." In view of such standing John declared, "We are of God : he that knoweth God heareth us : he that is not of God heareth not us. Hereby know we the spirit of truth and the spirit of error" (1 Eph. iv.) Yet in the face of such declarations, our author exclaims, "We cannot doubt that some, perhaps many, did arrive at such an advanced state, as not to need any external means of learning the knowledge of the will of God : that they did attain to that more excellent way of dwelling in love, which is dwelling in God, by which they saw to the end of all ministrations, except such as were purely spiritual, and acting immediately in and on their own spirits. And if they did continue to observe any outward institutions, it was only in deference to their brethren, who had not yet arrived so far." 1st, We would greatly desire to have a list of names, or at least to get some further information concerning that unique band of men, who were exalted into a more advanced state by forsaking, in spirit or in conduct, the appointments of the Lord Christ, and the teaching and example of his inspired Apostles. Surely they led the forlorn hope, and perished to a man in their onslaught against the city of God ! But if our author can rescue them from oblivion, by all means let us have another chapter in our chronicles for this saintship of an abnormal character. 2nd, We could greatly desire more light on that kind of love and fellowship with God, which consists in disobedience to his known will. It appears to us a dangerous road, by no means leading to the Palace of the Great King, but quite in a contrary direction—towards the confines of darkness and despair. Our Lord taught,

"If ye love me, keep my commandments;" and John the Beloved, in defining love, says, "This is the love of God, that we keep his commandments." All other kinds of love, however pretentious and plausible, are spurious and hollow, false and ruinous to body, soul, and spirit. 3rd, We have likewise a strong desire to hear something more concerning those ministrations which are purely spiritual. What are they? And how do such ministries get into contact with man, who is clothed with a body of flesh? The great blunder of our author and his friends, consists in forgetting that man is not a bodiless phantom or unclothed spirit, but an organized being, who requires, by the necessity of his nature or constitution, external ordinances, which may, by faith in the divine testimony, connect him with the unseen.

Our author then proceeds to argue, that as in our Lord's case, his knowledge was immediately derived, the worship he came to set up must be affected thereby; and he argues that our knowledge may be derived immediately from God by the operation and indwelling of his Spirit in the heart. To which we reply, first, that he forgets that our Captain was God manifest in the flesh, all the fulness of the Godhead bodily dwelling in him; and consequently, though we participate in his spiritual nature, we cannot take his supernatural standpoint in knowledge or in power. Second, we beg to remind our author that the information which the Holy Spirit has for us, is delivered unto us by prophets and apostles—where there is fulness unbounded—depths which have never been explored. As to inward light, in one sense the light of the Sun is inward, for it must get in before it enlightens; but it will neither enlighten a blind man nor glorify the bottom of a coal mine. So the greater light of God's word is inward, after it gets in: "The entrance of thy word giveth light." But all these lights must first shine externally, and be received through proper organs.

But the most astounding argument employed by our author is founded on a passage in the book of Revelation. "And I saw no temple therein, for the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the temple of it." On this our author remarks—"Is it not, therefore, clear that those who are being made meet in this world to dwell and worship in that city, will, as they advance in their progress, be prepared more and more to dispense with any other temple service than that of the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb, and thus anticipate in degree their final, their eternal inheritance?" In short, they are to leave behind them the first principles, the external ordinances, even if divinely appointed, and rest in silent contemplation.

Surely men of good common sense are most likely to feel, that the best preparation for a higher life may be found in the earnest discharge of the duties of this—that fitness for a more sublime dispensation may be most assuredly realized by the joyful use of the ordinances which belong to the dispensation under which we live. But our author and his friends are not willing to be regulated by good sense. Let us try his argument a little further. "It is generally supposed, for instance, that the spiritual body will require no food." Proceeding on that supposition, would it be well to approximate to that condition, viz.: to prepare for the celestial by famine and emaciation? Must we turn anchorites, dig our roots in the forest, and drink our liquor from the ditch? Again, it is certain that the holy ones who rise in the resurrection of the worthy in the age of glory, "neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are like unto the angels." Now should it be our ambition to approximate to that? Must we prepare for glory by celibacy, and play over again the old criminal game in which nature took vengeance on disobedience to her laws? If we could manage this, it would at least have one advantage—by bringing this dispensation speedily to an end; and then, perchance, something better might supervene. Again, on the same ground let the author try his method, by paying attention to another clause in the context of his favorite passage—"And the city had no need of the Sun, nor of the Moon to shine in it, for the glory of God did lighten it." Seeing this is so, would it not be well for our author and his friends to seek preparation for such a condition, by doing as much as possible without the light of the Sun and Moon? This would give them darkness, in addition to silence ; and surely with such a congenial alliance the great work of spiritual preparation would move on in most stately and effectual stages. But it is time to be done with this. The author, if acquainted with his Bible, must be well aware that if the Jew had abandoned the temple service, and the ordinances of Judaism, in order to prepare himself for the higher economy which the prophets had predicted, he would have perished without mercy. And the mode of dealing with Christian ordinances, to make ready for the inviolable world, which our author recommends, is more criminal, though it may not bring temporal ruin, the sanctions of the dispensations differing so widely.

It is by no means certain that our author has apprehended any part of the passage in Revelation. It was never designed to teach us that there will in that state be no ceremonial worship—no great gatherings, with audible and rapturous celebration. It only teaches that there will be no narrow, circumscribed temple, where all are holy and sanctified—the whole city being the external temple, with God and the Lamb as the peculiar and never-fading splendour. As for external acts of homage and worship, if our author had read a little closer—a little more of the context—he might have seen, that besides the glorified within, there shall be saved nations outside, who, from time to time—kings and people in harmony, as they walk in the light of the great city—bring their glory and honour to the gates in fealty and adoration.

We wish that our author had looked a little more into the Book of Revelation for the spirit and form of worship, for reverence and triumph embodied in something like ritual and ceremonialism. As he has made an incursion, almost a rail, into the future, as shewn in the Apocalypse, we will follow him into that book for a more legitimate purpose. The fourth chapter gives us some information concerning four and twenty elders, who surely represent redeemed humanity in some shape ; and they fall down before him who sitteth upon the throne, and worship him that liveth for ever and ever, and cast their crowns before the throne saying, "Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory, and honour, and power : for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created." The fifth chapter informs us concerning a multitude who fell down before the Lamb, having every one of them harps, and golden vials full of odours, which are the prayers of saints. "And they sang a new song, saying, Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof, for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood, out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation ; and hast made us unto our God kings and priests, and we shall reign on the earth." And then, after such key-note is struck, all voices, angelic and human, continue—even nature becomes vocal with praise—and the voices say, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain, to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honor, and glory, and blessing." The seventh chapter brings before us a multitude which no man could number, standing before the throne and the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and having palms in their hands, and crying with a loud voice—"Salvation to our God which sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb." They came, as we read, out of great tribulation—washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb : therefore are they before the throne of God, and serve him day and night in his temple. The fourteenth chapter gives some account of one hundred and forty-four thousand first-fruits, undefiled and guileless before God. And with voices of glory like meeting waters and harpings of inconceivable joy, they sing a new song before the throne, which no man can learn who is not of their consecrated company. The fifteenth chapter brings us to a sea of glass mingled with fire, where the people who have been victorious over the Beast and his mark, stand on the sea of glass, having the harps of God. "And they sang the song of Moses, the servant of God, and the song of the Lamb, saying, Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty : just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints." Now whether our author and his friends are doing the best they can to prepare for ritual of such an order—for continual service in hymns, and songs, and harpings before the throne—I leave them to judge. We earnestly desire that our author may be among those who are victorious over the Beast, and that he may have a voice among those who sing the song of Moses and of the Lamb; but we can assure him, with full conviction, that weariness in the service of this dispensation is no preparation, and that the right way to be furnished is by reverential and joyful obedience to those ordinances which are binding in our own age. It will be useless and vain to approach and say, "Lord, Lord!" if we have not done the things which he commanded.

REVIVAL OF INFIDELITY.

If the work of God can be revived, so can that of the Devil. If the progress of Christian truth can become more rapid, so, also, can the efforts to spread Infidel falsehood become more bold and numerous. Joseph Barker, as a sort of chief apostle from Satan, has re-commenced in England his crusade against the truth, and avowed disbelief is "looking up." He has just concluded a public discussion at Bradford with Thomas Cooper, which, when printed, we hope to review.

Mr. Cooper has since written—

"The arrival of Joseph Barker from America has given new life to unbelief, and to this hardest, foulest kind of unbelief. During my pilgrimage over the land for two years and a half, and the essay of one year and nine months in London which preceded it, I seemed—until Joseph Barker returned—to be experiencing less and less struggle. If opposition were ever offered, if the invitation to state objections were ever accepted, the procedure on the part of sceptics was so timid and faint, and the disposition to object or oppose seemed to be growing so feeble—that I began exultantly to hope the time was at hand when I should lay aside altogether my present mode of labour, and go through England simply preaching CHRIST daily, and calling men together for prayer and praise. My heart often overflowed with joyous anticipation that I should so be allowed to spend the closing years of my life, and then, from the threshold of holiest employ here, step into the rapt worship of the choir assembled around the everlasting throne. But, it is not God's will: the battle for which his all-wise permissive Providence has prepared me is not over yet; it may even last to the end of my life, although God may prolong it for many years. Until this man came back, the champions of scepticism presented no front of either defiance or defence, but feebleness. Holy-oake's health was sinking, and his advocacy of unbelief was characterized more and more by restraint. The older advocates of Owenite scepticism had either died out, or gone quietly into trade or some retired mode of living. Southwell had gone to New Zealand, and Robert Cooper, the professed Atheist, had become a poorly little "gentleman" and a "silent man," in consequence of having a little income left him by an old sceptical pawnbroker. It is true the "tall, impudent, good-looking lad," Charles Bradlaugh, whose bladder-pate delights in grandiloquently styling himself "Iconoclast," had stepped into the arena of contest, declaring himself a Spinozist, and "a part of all things," and all that. But he was nobody—that is to say, he was no person, but only "a part of all things;" and his boyish prate could not do much harm, although it was dealt forth with very loud impudence. It was the return of this man from America which "raised the Devil"—in plain English. Everywhere, sceptics are now all-exultant expectation. "The man has come who will speak out," they say; and they mean to support him. Subscriptions are being made to furnish him, once more, with a steam press. At present, he deals forth unmitigated Atheism weekly, in The National Reformer, a paper started at Sheffield, but now published in London. When he gets his own steam-press, his means for consummating his purposes will be still more commensurate with his will. This man is not what he was when he left England for America a few years ago. The only times I ever saw him in my life before the meeting last week at Bradford, was once in 1849 and once in 1850. He was then sceptical, like myself; but he was neither Atheist nor Materialist. He listened to my eulogy of the moral beauty of Christ, while I lectured at Leeds; and declared himself immensely gratified. Ten years have made no easily describable difference in both of us. God has graciously drawn me towards himself, pardoned me, and filled me with humble love to the Redeemer. Poor Joseph Barker has gone farther and farther away from God. He began to proclaim open Atheism in America, and was hooted, execrated, and his life threatened, on account of it. He went thither expecting to get large possession of land, and be rich. He has lost his money, and come to England again from necessity; but he has come back with all his Atheism in his heart, and a vengeful desire to inflict blasphemy on the minds of all his fellow-creatures who reverence God. Disappointment has not only soured him, but rendered him diabolical in his purposes towards religion. He thirsts to appal the minds of Christians with his daring accusations of God ; to strike them dumb and drive them out of hearing by his hideous blasphemies. He dilates on every instance of suffering there is in the world—he strives to collect into one withering focus all facts that can scorch a poor weak soul that clings to God's goodness—he determines to depict the world as one vast pig-sty, dung-heap, lazar-house, and slaughter-field combined, and to hold up this picture as the only true one—he pushes it forward, determined you shall see nothing else ; and he croaks and howls alternately that this is the only world, and it is a horrible world, and the God that made it must be a horrible God, if there be one. And then he goes on to say there is no God. He threw away the first part of the proposition he had to maintain at Bradford. He renounced the words, 'That it is foolish and presumptuous to deny the existence of God and the reality of a future state,' though they were his own. He declared he would never use them more ; but would, on the contrary, maintain that the folly and presumption lay with those who would continue to maintain there was a God and a future state. He seemed to be stripping up his sleeve and baring his arm for a full and fearful fight with his Maker ; and I expect him, henceforth, to commence a warfare for defiant Atheism such as he has never yet attempted. Thousands of ardent young spirits are likely to enlist themselves under the black banner of this Yorkshire Belial. The men of the West Riding seem to be in special danger. They are great admirers of boldness and outspokenness, and much prone to imitate those who exhibit these qualities. The man who "hits th' right nail o' th' head" is their favorite always ; that is to say, the man who most boldly expresses their own thoughts. Now, this principle of discontent with God's world, of accusation of God's wisdom and goodness in its arrangements, has been rife for a long time in many minds ; but the discontent was only muttered or grumbled ; they could not gather courage to tell it aloud. I fear the courage will not long be lacking now. Joseph Barker's shout of defiance against God will find a fearful echo in the hearts of many of them, if I am not mistaken. The challenge to prove that God exists, to clear his holy government of the foul aspersions they will cast upon it, will soon be heard more loudly ; it will come upon the ears of Christian ministers in our hives of industry, and make their hearts ache with agony. Shall the challenge be met ? Let Christian friends sift the question among themselves, and for themselves. My part is taken. I cannot quit my work. I am ready to encounter Barker, or Holyoake, aye, the whole host gathered together, at any time or place that can be agreed on, in defence of God's existence, his moral government, man's rightful responsibility to God, and the certainty of a future state of rewards and punishments. I will not meet any man to discuss the 'Divine authority of the Bible,' if the man avows his belief that there is no Divine authority in the universe, for that would be a sham fight. The clear battle of Belief against Unbelief is the only battle in which I feel I can consistently join ; and I am ready to enter on it anywhere, in spite of all the horror of hearing and feeling to which it may expose me."

Shall it be met ? Certainly ! Will truth be worsted in a fair combat ? It never has been, and never will be. But Mr. Cooper has promised several articles upon the question—"How ought the challenges of Sceptics to be met if we accept them ?" What Mr. C. will favour us with remains to be seen. In the meantime, so far as we are concerned, we say in answer to their challenges—

1. They shall have equal space in our periodicals, providing that in each instance they secure to us the same in papers devoted to their cause.

2. We shall hold ourselves prepared to lecture in reply to their lectures.

3. Public discussion we shall rather seek than avoid ; but under such arrangements that believers are not made to support Infidel priests. Either the public halls must be open free, the disputants, or their friends, paying the cost in equal parts ; or, if a charge for admission be made, then the expenses only paid from the proceeds, and the remainder given to some benevolent institution. If it be objected, that "Infidel lecturers must be supported," the answer is—Let Infidels support them as Christians support those who preach the Gospel. Leave them to their own disciples for support, and they will soon seek a more lucrative trade. A Secularist priest is advertised to preach (next week) "The Gospel of Secularism ;" but no one can hear it "without money and without price"—the common people must pay 3d. and the better sort can have reserved seats on higher terms. We have at least this consolation—that in preaching the other Gospel (which is a Gospel) those with whom we act, open a hundred places every week, and ask not one penny from any one who is not fully with us.

4. Ready for fair and full discussion, we shall avoid increasing the attendance at their lectures by not accepting the offered ten minutes at the close.

The debate following the lecture is to many the more attractive part, and they pay for admission, when but for that they would not attend.

5. Lastly, We urge that it is the duty of every believer to avoid paying for admission to lectures, the profit from which is to support the cause of the avowed enemies of Christianity. Unless, in the case of one who intends to lecture in reply—who will then need to hear them—it should be a settled point, that not one penny shall the priests of Infidelity have from us. D. K.

A MODERN EVANGELIST.

THE following has gone the round of the papers—

"BAPTISM OF THE REV. H. GRATTAN GUINNESS.—The Rev. H. G. Guinness was baptized on Saturday evening last, in Somerset-street chapel, Bath. After singing and prayer, Mr. Guinness gave an address to a crowded and attentive audience. He said that for five years the subject had occupied his attention, and that he had come at length to the conclusion that only believers in the Lord should be baptized. During his public ministry he had been asked to baptize infants and adults; but he declined the former because he considered it to be unscriptural, and the latter because he had not himself been baptized on a profession of faith. After reading to his audience the various portions of Scripture which refer to the mode, the subject, the design, and obligation of baptism, he strongly urged believers in Christ not to plead ignorance of this important matter, nor to permit indifference, or prejudice, or pride, to keep them from the delightful privilege of being buried with him in baptism. After prayer he was baptized by Lord Congleton. Mr. Saltan, of Bideford, then addressed the meeting on the subject of earnestness in seeking and securing the blessings of the Gospel. Mr. Code brought the interesting service to a close by prayer."

In all directions Mr. Guinness has been hailed as an acceptable Evangelist. For two or three years he has been preaching in season and out of season, and during the whole time he has been unable to do the work of an Evangelist in accordance with the Lord's instruction—"Go ye, disciple all nations, baptizing them into the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit." Infants he would not baptize, because unscriptural subjects—adults he declined, because himself unbaptized! We honor him for obeying the truth, but if so long convinced that infant baptism is unscriptural, and, therefore, not Christian, why was his obedience so long delayed? Surely it becomes us to be a little less tardy in obeying the Saviour's commands—more especially when we are calling others to serve him. But what will Mr. Guinness do now? Lord Congleton, we understand, is with one of the Plymouth-Brethren parties. This may indicate an advance on the part of Mr. Guinness in some particulars, but it does not lead us to hope that he will observe the line drawn by the apostles between the baptized and the unbaptized.

BAPTISTS IN AMERICA.

"The Baptist Almanack for the year 1861 has made its appearance. It contains, as usual, statistics of value and interest to Baptists. From the table of 'Grand Total of Regular Baptists in North America,' we learn that the number of Associations in the United States is 576; number of churches, 12,371; ordained ministers, 7837; licentiates, 1115; baptized in 1859, 72,086; total, 1,020,442. The number of Baptists in Nova Scotia is 13,057; in New Brunswick, 7703; in Canada, 13,715; West India Islands, (estimated) 36,350; making a grand total in North America of one million and ninety-one thousand one hundred and sixty-seven Regular Baptists. Of other denominations that practice immersion, the almanack sets down the Anti-mission at 60,000; Freewill Baptists, 59,791; Six Principle Baptists, 3000; Seventh Day Baptists, 6577; Church of God, or Winebrenarians, 13,800; Disciples, 350,000; Tunkers, 8200; Mennonites, 36,280. If these are added to the above, it will make one million six hundred and eighteen thousand eight hundred and fifteen who give in their adhesion to immersion."

The word Baptist is often used to denote an immersed believer. Well, it is something to read of approaching to two millions of such in the United States of America. But what a motley group—"Regular Baptists"—"Freewill Baptists"—"Six Principle Baptists"—"Seventh Day Baptists"—"Winebrenarians," &c. Then there are the 350,000 "Disciples," who can at least say—there were men in the days of the first church, including the Apostles themselves, who were called Disciples of Christ, and why should there not be such now! Which of the other bodies can say the same of its name?

"WISE TO WIN SOULS."

THE following reprinted in The Freeman, from the New York Examiner, may furnish a lesson to the reader. What can one poor man do! Let him try, and who can say what will be the result. It is also a pleasure to know, that the so-called Baptist churches alluded to are much nearer the New Testament order than most churches of the same name in this country.

"Almost forty years ago, a young man of humble extraction, and who had been a servant in a German family, in the Grand-Duchy of Oldenburg, left Germany for England. He resided in that country for several years, and was brought to the knowledge of the truth while there. At length, accompanied by his wife, a pious and highly intelligent English lady, he returned to Germany, and located himself at Hamburg, as a bookseller, keeping, in addition to his other books, a depository of the Lower Saxony Tract Society, and of the Edinburgh Bible Society, and impelled by his love of souls, occasionally going out into the vicinity with Bibles and tracts as a colporteur. He was connected with the English Independent Church in Hamburg, and was regarded as a useful and active Christian. But God had something more for him to do than simply to keep that little bookshop in Hamburg. An American Baptist clergyman was visiting Germany, and often dropped into the book-store, where were to be found religious books. He had frequent conversations with the bookseller on subjects connected with the advancement of Christ's kingdom, and at length became a confidant of the anxieties which filled his breast. He felt that the Scriptures required him to be baptized on the profession of his faith; and he believed also that God had called him to the work of the ministry. Some five or six others, like himself, were convinced of the truth and necessity of believers' baptism. The American minister examined the bookseller and his friends carefully as to their faith and doctrinal views, and being satisfied, baptized the little company, seven in all, and constituted them as a church, the first Baptist church in Hamburg, and ordained the bookseller as their pastor.

"Thus commissioned to labor for Christ, this poor man, now in the vigour of manhood, determined to devote himself wholly to the work. He visited from house to house—he distributed Bibles and tracts—he preached wherever he could obtain an audience, and converts in abundance followed his preaching and conversations. These, after careful examination, he baptized, and the little church soon became so large, that he was obliged to rent a large hall, over his store, for them to meet in. This activity and zeal roused opposition. He was summoned before the magistrate, and fined and imprisoned once and again, for preaching God's Word.

"Then came the great fire, which destroyed more than one fourth of the city. Hundreds and thousands were rendered homeless. Many were injured or sick, and the property of others was exposed to depredators. Thieves and plunderers abounded. The missionary—for the Missionary Union had aided in his support—had not long before hired the whole warehouse, in which was his depository and the hall where he preached; and these he now threw open, and brought thither the homeless, the sick and wounded, and the exposed property of his fellow-citizens, and he and his family and the members of the little church ministered to the necessities of these recipients of their charity.

"Prejudice and hostility were disarmed by this exhibition of Christian charity. The Senate of Hamburg, by several decrees, granted them the privilege of worshipping God unmolested, and expressed its approval of their noble conduct in the emergency.

"Twenty-six years have now passed since the baptism of that bookseller—the Rev. J. G. Oncken; and now, as a result of his labors, and those of his associates, converted mainly under his preaching, there are sixty-five Baptist churches, and 756 preaching stations in Germany, in which 120 preachers and Bible-readers labor constantly; 8000 baptized believers are now members of these churches, besides a still larger number, who have either emigrated to other countries, or gone home to rest above; sixty-five Sunday schools, attended by 1200 children, are held every Sabbath; and 12,000 Bibles and 450,000 tracts are annually circulated. Such is the work which a single active, zealous, devoted Christian, with God's blessing upon his efforts, has been able to set on foot. Who will imitate his example?"

BIRMINGHAM.

Since our notice last month we have taken the large hall at the Odd Fellows, Temple-street, (the smaller room was at first occupied) at a yearly rent of £64 for the Lord's-day. We have several small meetings at houses during the week, which are found very advantageous. I have this month immersed seven, and several baptized persons, who have been some time out of fellowship, have been received. This week I have delivered addresses upon the Primitive Churches and Primitive and Modern Preaching in Leamington. Next week I expect to take the Birmingham Secularist in hand.

DUNDEE.

Since I wrote last month, two men have been immersed and added to the church. We are moving along harmoniously, and our prospects are encouraging.

On Lord's-day last, we had a visit from our esteemed Brother Thomas Brown, from Cupar, who delivered two excellent addresses during the day, one on the "Original Gospel," and the other on "The Bible against Modern Revivalism," to large audiences. The powerful and animated style in which they were delivered, completely rivetted the attention of all present, and we trust, will be the means of dispelling the fogs of mysticism and superstition by which many here are enveloped, through the false teaching of our modern revivalists. He completely exposed the fallacy of the doctrines of such teachings by referring to the revivals recorded in the New Testament, such as was on the day of Pentecost, &c.; and asked the reason why the same response, as given by the Apostle Peter, was not now adhered to, viz.; "Repent, and be baptized every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit." Happy they who know the truth!

Our Brother Brown is very zealous in his efforts in making known the truth in the villages in Fife near his residence, and is intending to proclaim the Gospel there on Lord's-day evenings during the Winter.

We received this week a letter from our venerable, and highly-esteemed Brother A. Campbell, of Bethany, Virginia, congratulating us on the success and progress of the apostolic Gospel in England and Scotland; also of the new buildings of the College of Bethany. You will please insert the letter in the Harbinger, which, we have no doubt, will be read with interest. Brother Campbell appears still quite active, and as zealous as ever in the cause of truth.

We hope he will be spared for many years to come. How few have spent such a valuable and useful life as he, and his rare abilities as a scholar, writer, and public speaker cannot be surpassed, which has given a great impetus to original Christianity, both in this country and in the United States. Do you not think, Brother Wallis, the brethren in this country might give him a cordial invitation to visit us again? What say you to this? Time is short, and if the brethren desire it, it will require to be done speedily. Many, I am certain, would rejoice to see him and hear his voice again!*

SEQUEL TO THE REPORT FROM SCOTLAND.

According to the promise contained in my note to the Annual Meeting, I beg to inform the brethren that the arrangement then spoken of as "pending," was soon after cordially and pleasantly completed.

This fact speaks for itself, as to the good terms on which the churches in Scotland, generally, and I, stand towards each other; and renders it quite unnecessary for me to notice, in detail, the remarks of the Dundee office-bearers, in the October British Millennial Harbinger. Their letter, suffice it to add, must have been dictated under a decided misapprehension of the state of affairs in Scotland; and as it does not profess to have been authorized by any church, furnishes no occasion for my penning a word which could either pain their minds, or annoy the readers of the Harbinger by the obtrusion of matters in which they are not concerned, and regarding which they are, of course, in no position to form a judgment.

LANGLEY (NEAR MARLBOROUGH).

We have great pleasure in announcing, that since we contributed to your Items of News, we have added five to our number by immersion, and have a good prospect of further success.

TREDEGAR.

About twelve months ago, four brethren from Merthyr Tydvil and Aberdare removed to the above place, and met for worship in one of their houses. Shortly after we had the pleasure of adding another sister through immersion. Three brethren and one sister from the Particular Baptists also joined us; and one who had been a member with the Primitive Methodists obeyed the Lord in baptism, and was added to our number.

* No one would more rejoice than myself to see and hear Bro. Campbell again; but the question of slavery still presents itself, and might be obtruded, if not in Glasgow, yet in other places; and perhaps, too, by some of our own brethren.—J. W.

A Sunday school was established, which is attended by adults, and affords favourable opportunities for enquirers. Failing to engage a convenient public room, we betook ourselves to open-air preaching, and took our stand on the Market-square, where large audiences listened attentively to the advocacy of Primitive Christianity one Lord's-day after the other, occasionally interrupted by the unpropitious weather. At these meetings large numbers of tracts have been distributed, obtained, some at a small cost, others gratuitous from Brethren Milner (Edinburgh) and Owen (Wrexham); who, no doubt, rejoice with us in the hope that eventually the seed thus so freely and extensively sown, will bear much fruit, to the glory of the Giver of all good. Notwithstanding these efforts, we feel the lack of a brother or brethren able to speak English, the majority of the inhabitants being English speaking people. Through a misfortune, we were greatly grieved at being deprived of a visit from Bro. King when in this part. However, we have been much cheered with the presence of our beloved Brother E. Evans, who came here on the 29th September, and remained for eight days, during which time we held ten meetings; three in the open-air, three in a public hall, and four in houses, our brother speaking at each. The brethren have been edified and strengthened by this visit, and we trust that his labours without will be productive of good. If circumstances would but have allowed him to remain with us for a few months, we feel persuaded it would have been the means of drawing many to embrace the New Testament order. It is a source of regret that Bro. E. or another of like spirit, were not situated in this very populous district, where thousands continually perish for the lack of knowledge, and many professed Christians are dissatisfied with the present state of things, and only wait for a helping hand to guide them to the old paths.

But meantime, let us, brethren, according to means and abilities, "earnestly contend for the faith once for all delivered to saints." Oh! that we might feel as we ought for the Heathenism of our land, then would we; indeed, endeavour to send out and sustain faithful brethren to spread abroad the glorious light of the Gospel; and God's blessing would attend our labours in "turning many from darkness to light." Let us "abound in the work of the Lord, knowing that our faith shall not be in vain in the Lord." W. WILLIAMS.

WIGAN.

We gratefully acknowledge the power of God in the conversion of thirteen persons, who have been immersed into Christ since our last report. We have also had five restored, some of them after an absence of many years. J. COLLIER.

FAMILY CIRCLE.

LITTLE FAULTS.

If some religious people keep their faults to the last, it is because they have all their life imagined that religion was not intended to interfere with "little things;" that is, with small points of manner and character. We get from our religious principles what we use them for, and no more. If the power of a renewed will is not brought to bear directly upon our little faults, they will increase even while the religious character deepens and improves. There is no fault so small that it will disappear of itself. I often wonder that believers should be content to carry with them to the grave the lesser evils of a fallen nature. If we shall one day be restored to the perfect likeness of our glorified Redeemer, shall we put a limit which God has not put to the degree in which, even in this world, the wonderful change shall be wrought upon us, as we advance in all the graces of the Christian character?

PEACE OF MIND.

I know of but one way of fortifying my soul against gloomy presages and terrors of mind, and that is, by securing to myself the friendship and protection of that Being who disposes of events, and governs futurity. He sees at one view the whole thread of my existence, not only that part of it which I have already passed through, but that which runs forward into the depths of eternity. When I lay me down to sleep, I recommend myself to his care; when I awake, I give myself up to his direction. Amidst all the evils that threaten me, I will look up to him for help, and question not but he will avert them, or turn them to my advantage. Though I know neither the time nor the manner of the death that I am to die, I am not at all solicitous about it, because I am sure he knows both, and that he will not fail to comfort and support me under them, whatever may be their character.—Addison.

OLD AGE.

How beautiful is old age ! The Sun is ever brightest when it is about to sink below the horizon, and hide its radiant brow behind the curtains of a peaceful sleep. It is in the evening that the nightingale sings its sweetest songs, and it is Autumn time that Nature is brightest and most beautiful ; how can it be, then, that the sunset of life should be less joyous and cheerful than its meridian ? Everybody says that old age is an evil, and everybody believes it, too ; for the words have been drilled into the mind a thousand times ; but how many have found that " the fear of ill exceeds the ill we fear," and that the enjoyment of life suffers no diminution from the increase of years.

Age is a mighty thing. It has triumphed over the trials of life, and flushed with victory it awaits its reward. From bloodless lips, the youth, as he sits gazing into the wrinkled features and lack-lustre eyes before him, hears the experience of the past ; he is warned of the shoals and quicksands of life, and directed to the noblest channels, and heeds the warning. Thus age is mighty again, for into the hot blood of rising generations it sends its own genius and directs its course.

Age is holy—it is the sanctuary of well spent lives—it is the temple at the top of the ladder of existence, where tottering limbs and wearied hearts may find repose, whence they may look back without regret upon the great world they are so soon to leave with smiles of encouragement to those who are still struggling amidst the stormy waves of fortune, and then turn and gaze with yearning eyes upon the portals of that wondrous spirit realm that will soon unfurl, and give them entrance to the glories of the Lord.

HOW TO MEET SLANDER.

A BLACKSMITH having been slandered, was requested to apply to a Court of Law for redress. He replied with true wisdom, " I will never sue anybody for slander ; I can go into my shop, and work out a better character in six months, than I could obtain in any court in a year."

POWER OF EXAMPLE.

THE lives of men oftentimes convince more strongly than their words ; their language may persuade, but their lives command.

PATH OF SAFETY.

It is one of the worst errors, that there is any other path of safety, besides that of duty.

THE "LIFE OF FAITH."

IN the course of his address delivered to the students of the Edinburgh University, Mr. Gladstone thus spoke of " the life of faith :"—

" I know that among you there are always many who are already, even in their tender years, fighting with a mature and manly courage the battle of life. When they feel themselves lonely amidst the crowd — when they are for a moment disheartened by that difficulty which is the rude and rocking-cradle of every kind of excellence — when they are conscious of the pinch of poverty and self-denial — let them be conscious, too, that a sleepless Eye is watching them from above, that their honest efforts are assisted, their humble prayers are heard, and all things are working together for their good. Is not this the life of faith, which walks by your side from your rising in the morning to your lying down at night — which lights up for you the cheerless world, and transfigures all that you encounter, whatever be its outward form, with hues brought down from heaven ?"

WORKING AND THINKING.

It is no less fatal error to despise labor when regulated by intellect, than to value it for its own sake. We are always, in these days, trying to separate the two ; we want one man to be always thinking and another to be always working, and we call one a gentleman and the other an operative, whereas the working man ought always to be thinking, and the thinker ought to be working ; and both should be gentlemen in the best sense. As it is, we make both ungente, the one envying, the other despising his brother ; and the mass of society is made up of morbid thinkers and miserable workers. Now it is only by labor that thought can be made healthy, and only by thought that labor can be made happy, and the two cannot be separated with impunity. All professions should be liberal, and there should be less pride felt in peculiarity of employment, and more in excellency of achievement.—Ruskin.

USE OF TIME.

LEISURE without learning is death, and idleness the grave of living men. It was a brave saying of Scipio, and every scholar can endorse it, " That he was never less alone, than when alone." I pity those who spend their time in doing nothing, or worse than nothing—who are always idle or ill employed. Rise early to your business, learn good things, oblige good men ; these are things of which you will never repent.

THE VATICAN.

THIS word is often used, but there are many who do not understand its import. The term refers to a collection of buildings on one of the seven hills of Rome, which covers a space of twelve hundred feet in length, and a thousand feet in breadth. It is built on the spot once occupied by the garden of cruel Nero. It owes its origin to the Bishop of Rome, who, in the early part of the sixth century, erected an humble residence on its site. About the year 1160, Pope Eugenius rebuilt it on a magnificent scale. Innocent II. a few years afterwards, gave it up as a lodging to Peter II. King of Arragon. In 1305, Clement V. at the instigation of the King of France, removed the Papal See from Rome to Avignon, when the Vatican remained in a condition of obscurity and neglect for more than seventy years. But soon after the return of the pontifical court to Rome, an event which had been so earnestly prayed for by poor Petrarch, and which finally took place in 1376, the Vatican was put into a state of repair, again enlarged, and it was thenceforward considered as a regular palace and residence of the Popes, who, one after the other, added fresh buildings to it, and gradually encircled it with antiquities, statues, pictures and books, until it became the richest depository in the world. The library of the Vatican was commenced fourteen hundred years ago. It contains forty thousand manuscripts, among which are some by Pliny, St. Thomas, St. Charles Borromeo, and many Hebrew, Syrian, Arabian, and Armenian Bibles. The whole of the immense buildings composing the Vatican are filled with statues found beneath the ruins of ancient Rome; with paintings by the old masters; and with curious medals and antiquities of almost every description. When it is known that there have been exhumed more than seventy thousand statues from the ruined temples and palaces of Rome, the reader can form some idea of the richness of the Vatican. It will ever be held in veneration by the student, the artist, and the scholar. Raphael and Michael Angelo are enthroned there, and their throne will be endurable as the love of beauty and genius in the hearts of their admirers.

TIME.

TIME is the most solemn inheritance to which every man is born heir who has a life rent of this world—a little section cut out of eternity and given us to do our work in—an eternity before, an eternity behind, and the small stream of life between, floating swiftly from one into the vast bosom of the other.

THE FULNESS OF CHRIST.

THE fountain has not the less water for the vessel it fills, nor the sun the less light for that which it gives forth to the stars; so the Lord Jesus Christ has never a whit the less fulness for what he gives forth unto his saints.

FAITH.

OF all graces faith is the root grace, and if this die you will find your graces languish. Your hope, love, fear, patience, humility, and joy, can never outlive your faith.

A DOUBTING HEART.*

"WHERE are the swallows fled?
Frozen and dead,
Perchance upon some bleak and stormy shore.

O doubting heart!
Far over purple seas
They wait, in sunny ease,
The balmy Southern breeze,
To bring them to their Northern home once more.

Why must the flowers die?
Prisoned they lie
In the cold tomb, heedless of tears or morn.
O doubting heart!
They only sleep below
The soft white ermine snow,
While Winter winds shall blow,
To breathe and smile upon them soon again.

The Sun has hid its rays
These many days;
Will dreary hours never leave the earth?
O doubting heart!
The stormy clouds on high
Veil the same sunny sky,
That soon when Spring is nigh,
Shall wake the Summer into golden mirth.

Fair hope is dead, and light
Is quenched in night.
What sound can break the silence of despair?
O doubting heart!
The sky is overcast,
Yet stars shall rise at last Brighter for darkness past,
And angels silver voices stir the air.

Lieth our loved ones cold
In church-yard mould:
To die so young! ah! sad untimely fate.
O doubting heart!
Them shall the Saviour own
Before the great white throne;
And both, not one alone,
Shall smiling wait thee at the eternal gate!

HUMAN HAPPINESS.

A CERTAIN Doctor of Laws, who lived some three thousand years ago, minus only one hundred and fifty years, wisely said :—"Of making many books there is no end, and much reading (or much study) is a weariness of the flesh. Let us, then, hear the conclusion of the whole matter : Fear God and keep his commandments ; for this is the whole duty—rather, the whole happiness of man," or, perhaps, the whole profit of man.

The question which he propounded to himself was not what is the duty of man, but "what profit has a man of all the labours which he taketh under the Sun ?" He gives his own experience, then throws down the gauntlet, with this challenge :—"What can the man do who cometh after the King ?" Even that which has already (or formerly) been done. He, however, discovered—that "there is an excellency in wisdom, more than in folly"—"that wisdom excels folly as light excels darkness."

But after a long recital of his own experience, he comes to the following sage result :—"Let us hear the conclusion of the whole" experience of my life—of the whole matter in debate ; "Fear God, and keep his commandments ; for this is the whole happiness of man."

Our Common Version misrepresents Solomon's conclusions. He was not writing a dissertation upon the duty of man, but upon the happiness of man—or, as he calls it, "the good" of man. What is that good—that summum bonum, as the Romans called it ;—"the chiefest good"—felicity.* What, then, is that happiness which a man should pursue all the days of his life ? This is the question submitted to every man for examination and decision. Does it consist in the luxuries of the festive board—the splendours of apparel—the equipage of kings and princes—the regalia of royalty—or in the splendid ensigns of autocracy ?

By no means—not in all these combined. Pope, the mellifluous poet, sings :

"All fame is foreign, but of true desert ;
Plays 'round the head, but comes not near the heart ;
One self-approving hour whole years outweighs

Of stupid starers, and of loud huzzas ;
And more true joy, Marcellus exiled feels,
Than Cæsar with a Senate at his heels."

An enlightened understanding, a good conscience, a pure heart, a philanthropic spirit, a pious and virtuous life, are worth more, so far as true honour and true happiness are concerned, than all the wealth of a Lydian Croesus—than all the genius of a Milton—than all the wisdom of a Grecian Solon—than all the heroism of the Macedonian Alexander, who is poetically said to have wept, forsooth, "because his arm was hampered, and had not room enough to do his work," to crown his ambition, and place him on the pinnacle of fame.

What singular and anomalous phantasms sport in the brains of Adam's monomaniac sons and daughters ! A large proportion of them pursue some ignis fatuus, some phantasm, some vain fantastic appearance, something imagined ; or, as Shakspeare says :—"All their interim is like a phantasm, a pleading or a hideous dream."

The Bible earnestly read and studied is the only cure for all mental diseases. It contemplates all mankind as naturally pre-disposed to frequent head-aches and heart-aches, which no earthly remedies can even mitigate, much less effectually cure.

There is but one balm of Gilead, and but one Physician there who can suc-

Not a man in a thousand has an adequate conception of that monosyllable sin. In its inception, in its progress, in its consummation, it has murdered man. It has subverted angels, principalities, and powers, and even attempted to dethrone Jehovah, and to annihilate the dominions and powers of the celestial spheres and empires. Anarchy and ruin, even everlasting destruction, are inscribed upon its blood-stained banners, and written upon the hearts of the confederated hosts in league against the Lord's anointed.

These are not the disconsolate imaginings of an alienated reason, or the dreary forebodings of a diseased mind. They are in cumulo, the wages of sin, and therefore inevitable. "The soul that sinneth" must, therefore, inevitably die.

Christians rejoice that we have a second Adam. He, too, is a representative person—the most splendid representative personage ever seen in the whole area of the universe. The idea of a representative personage was not, indeed, originally in human creation. Originally, in the full import of this word, there was not one representative person in the universe. There was, indeed, no necessity for a representative person anterior to the creation of man. And, therefore, this emergency or necessity arose from, or out of, the creation of Adam in the image of God. He was created a representative personage. He was both a representative of his Creator, and a representative of all that were in his person. He was an image of God. But what is an image? It is not enough to say it is a likeness.

God said in the preamble to the creation of man:—"Let us make man in our image after," or according to, "our likeness; and let them (not him alone, whom he then created) have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowls of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth. So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him, a male and a female created he them. And God blessed them, and God said to them: Be fruitful and multiply, and replenish the earth and subdue it; and have dominion over the fish of the sea, over the fowls of the air, and over every living thing that moveth (or creepeth) upon the earth" (Gen. i. 26, 27, 28.)

We shall now, with all deliberation, take up this theme, and analyze it as though we had never read or studied it before.

But, as yet, we have not the subject fully before us. We shall, therefore, hear Moses in other statements besides those already copied. In the second chapter, he again resumes the subject, and adds as follows, verse 7th:—"And Jehovah God (or the Lord God) formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life," or of lives, (ruach chaiyim is plural, indicating the breath of lives—animal, intellectual, and spiritual.)

There is, therefore, a plurality of personalities in humanity, as there is a plurality of personalities in Jehovah—or in absolute Divinity. We have the first, second, and third personality—in both Divinity and humanity. This is the essential idea of society. There is society in God. There is society in the angelic nature. There is society in the human nature.

The essential idea in all rational and moral natures is society. Without society the idea of happiness is inconceivable. A human being must have society, agreeable society, in himself. So must an angel—and so must Jehovah.

Hence, we read, "In the beginning (from eternity) was THE WORD, and THE WORD was with God, and THE WORD was God." He was in the beginning with God. He became flesh—a man—and dwelt in man, and amongst men. All Divinity, all spirituality, and all humanity, were concentrated in him. He is an effulgence—"the brightness of the Father's glory," and the express manifestation—or image of his person, the upholder of all things in creation's area.

Humanity so conceives of the God-head, or the Divinity. But no man can now, or can hereafter, entertain within his mental area, or comprehend in his finite spirit, a being that never began to be—who inhabits eternity—who fills the immensity of creation's area—and whose sublime oracle of himself is uttered in five words indicative of incomprehensibility. And these five words are only two words once repeated. Need I say they are—"I am that I am." Take out the middle term, and what remains? "I am, I am!" "Moses," said he, "when any one asks you by what authority do you act? Who commissioned you? Say to him so interrogating you—I AM has sent you. I AM THAT I AM has sent you." Here man stands speechless—Oherubim and Seraphim veil their faces and close their vision. In wonder unutterable, in eloquent silence enwrapt, they inquire no more. "Come, then, expressive silence, muse his praise!"

But humanity without Divinity, or Divinity without humanity, could not have been developed or appreciated in any realm of God's universe, so far as humanity can now penetrate the characteristics of either. We must study God in man, and man in God. Sceptics in Divine revelation, therefore, never can, by any conceivable instrumentality, ascertain the nature or character of God or man. Scepticism, in either case, is fatal to the science of God and to the science of man. The absolute sceptic is, therefore, in the condition of a ship in the Atlantic, without logboard or logbook, without pilot or helm, without Sun, Moon, or stars, borne headlong by every breeze, until at last he founders in the waves; and according to his own theory of no God, no Saviour, no revelation, no hereafter, is lost for ever.

All sceptics, who ever read the Bible with any discrimination, could they but commune with their own hearts, would find that the tap-root of their scepticism is planted, not so much in the sterility of their own heads, as in a cordial antipathy against the restraints and prohibitions which it enacts against the cherished indulgences in sensuous or immoral passions, appetites, and lusts. These occasionally war against their own convictions, but ultimately passion triumphs over reason, conscience, and all the moral sensibilities of their nature, and they become an easy prey to passion and temptation.

"Resist the Devil, and he will flee from you," said the Apostle James, just now eighteen hundred years ago—and it is as true and potent to-day, as it was at the time he wrote it. The lusts and passions of our nature often triumphantly war against reason, conscience, and the noblest instincts of our nature. Hence, the necessity of the Christian armour which Paul so eloquently details, and enforces upon our attention. "The shield of faith" is only a defensive weapon, but the "sword of the Spirit" is especially offensive, and it is exceedingly sharp, and all potent to wound or kill the adversary. But to keep the armour bright, we must watch and pray—praying always with all prayer and supplication in the spirit, and watching thereunto with all perseverance, and supplication for all saints—our fellow-soldiers in this good fight of faith.

But we may now be asked what is our theme? Was it not human happiness? Yes, human happiness. But in making an excursion through the whole volume of the Patriarchal, the Jewish, and the Christian Bible, we could not find the word happiness once. Strange! passing strange, the word happiness is not found once within the whole area of the inspired writings! No! in the English Holy Scriptures, Common Version, the word happiness is not once found! There is, therefore, no happi- ness in the Bible — Old Testament or New! Be not startled, courteous readers. "Strike, but hear me."

We have the substantive good ninety-two times in Holy Writ. We have also the adjective good eighty-two times. Still, some will say—"this is not happiness in fact or in form." It, however, is indicative of that which contributes to what we call happiness. Nay, indeed, it is paramount to happiness.

The root of the English word happiness, is hap—which originally was equivalent to the word chance. But happiness, in our present currency, indicates agreeable sensation—physical or mental.

Happiness is, with some, pleasing emotions or sensations. It is neither good luck nor good fortune. Felicity or blessedness makes a nearer approach to it. Self-enjoyment is, we presume to think, the nearest approach to it. But there are degrees of self-enjoyment. The highest degree of self-enjoyment is, in our conception, the nearest approach to the current idea of happiness, at least from our stand-point.

But our conception of self-enjoyment and that of our readers may, indeed, be quite different. Self is a very interesting and a very common topic. "A man's self," says Alexander Pope, "may be the worst thing to converse with in the world." We have, in our area of vision, some two hundred and twenty-five words in our vernacular, of which the first syllable is self. And a goodly number of dissyllables of which it is the last. It is, therefore, a sort of an Alpha Omega word in the self-dignifying nobles of the living world.

Still, it is an incontestible fact, that self-complacency is an essential element of a happy man. A man who cannot approve himself—or his course of conduct towards himself, his Creator, Redeemer, and his fellow-man — cannot possibly be a happy man. In other terms, he must possess a good conscience as respects his conduct towards his Creator, his Redeemer, his brethren in Christ, the wife of his bosom, his children, his servants, and all mankind, in all his relations to them, natural, moral, and religious. Such is the high price of human happiness, truthfully so-called. The more relations we possess, or in which we stand to heaven and earth, and to all their tenancies, the higher rises the price of happiness; and, also, the higher rises the happiness itself.

Such, in a few words, are our conceptions of human happiness. I was going to say Christian happiness. But a Christian is a man — and a Christian man is the only man that be regarded in the Supreme court of the universe as a happy man. We have, animally considered, happy men, happy horses, happy oxen, happy mules, and even happy asses. But no man can be happy, but a truly enlightened Christian.

INTERNAL EVIDENCE.

READER, our title is elliptical. We mean by it those evidences of the truth of Christianity which exist in the Christian. These are its elevating, purifying principles in his soul. This is truly internal evidence, for the Christian alone is conscious of it. The world may see it in the conduct which results from its influences, but it exists in the disciple, and is in him a spring-head of joy and comfort. Still, it may be in him, and to him, a sealed fountain. For the sake of the Christian, therefore, we ask his attention to this internal evidence. We wish him to see, that in the proportion as he permits and enables the Gospel to operate in his heart, in the self-same proportion does he obtain evidence of its truths, for his satisfaction and confirmation.

And the evidence is truly of a praiseworthy character—far more valuable to the disciple than all the philosophical arguments for Christianity which encumber the library shelves of the learned. Let us examine it. All then will confess this a truth, that the system which can give man the means for subduing his passions, and for preserving his soul in a pure and happy state, is, to him and for him, a perfect system. This Christianity does by its instructions and motives. By the former it lays before man the true state of his heart, shewing him that selfishness and sensuality, in their diversified forms, are his governing principles. The Gospel does this for the purpose of causing him to see and feel how much below his rank and dignity he lives — how unfit for that immortality for which he sighs—and how unqualified for the company of God and the angels, which, notwithstanding his depravity, he believes to be the consummation of bliss and happiness. It also declares that love and holiness ought to be the presiding spirits in his soul. This it does that he may see and feel how refined, exalted, and spiritualized he must become, in order to obtain eternal life, and a seat at God's right hand.

By its motives, the Gospel holds out the strongest inducements to man to subdue the natural, and exalt the spiritual, in his nature.

Now the man who has surrendered himself to the guidance of the Gospel, will have the consciousness, if he reflect, that its instructions and motives are divine. Thus, when he thinks upon the state of his heart before he believed, and thinks, too, upon the present tendencies of his nature, and compares them with the Bible description of the carnal mind, he is assured that the portraiture is by a divine hand. Its divinity becomes evident, because it is not only the deeds which enlightened but unregenerate men have perceived to be wrong, that the Bible denounces, but also those acts which the most advanced civilization would never, by itself, have perceived to be pernicious. Thus Christianity forbids actions to be done that are positively right in themselves, because of their tendency to wound a brother's mind. See Rom. xiv. 15, 1 Cor. viii. 8-13. It also condemns those thoughts, desires, and states of mind, declaring them to be corrupt and abominable, which the wisest Christian, before his conversion to God, never dreamt to be so vile and blighting. In fact, the Christian has to make some progress in divine knowledge, before he clearly comprehends and realizes the truth of the inspired declarations on this subject. But the truly-enlightened disciple does see and feel them too. Elevated and purified in thought and sentiment, he now discerns the grovelling earthly nature of his former ideas and feelings, and as clearly sees the exalted, divine character of those inspired by the Spirit of God.

Here, then, is a proof to the disciple, that the sacred book lays open, by divine inspiration, the by-paths, labyrinths, and hidden springs of the human heart; and by the same inspiration shews that it can, and how it can, be made a dwelling-place for Deity. Hence it is in vain to tell a reflecting Christian, that the Bible-philosophy of human nature is not from a divine source.

Again, the disciple finds, on reflection, that the motives of the Gospel bear the impress of divinity. Contemplated in their origin, nature, and tendency, he perceives their infinite superiority to the motives which actuated him when in the world.

It is human nature in its wants, ideas, and manners, either in the man himself, or in his fellow-creatures, which originates all the motives in the carnal man. Yes, they spring from this source, and they rise no higher. But it is God, in His power, mercy, and love, who originated the motives of Christianity. These are of two classes — the inducements to action, and the principles of action. God's blessings, as the gift of His Son, the forgiveness of sins, along with the promises and threatenings, are the inducements; and the fruits of the Spirit, as love, joy, peace, &c. are the principles. The disciple feels the wondrous difference between the worldly and Gospel motives; he feels that the authority and power of the latter are far greater in his mind than the former. Hence the motives arising from the love of life, from hunger, and from the love of riches, three of the greatest in human nature, have had to succumb to those of Christianity. Disciples, hear this proved by the words of one of your brethren (2 Tim. iv. 6-8, Phil. iii. 8, iv. 11-13.)

Again, the difference in the nature of the two classes of motives is clear and convincing. Those of the world are essentially temporal. There is not a motive in it which looks beyond this present state — not one that impels its professor towards an object beyond the regions of time and sense. But Gospel motives point to an imperishable state. They urge to the possession of realities which are spiritual and eternal, and at the same time exert a salutary influence over the Christian in his selection and use of earthly objects. Hence their sphere is not only the future and invisible; they have great power in the present and actual. In the mind of the Christian they control the motives of human nature, preventing them from becoming sensual and riotous, and elevating them to their true position.

The disciple, on reflection, will know and feel this superiority of Gospel motives.

Again, the tendency of human motives is to make man sensual and selfish. Every time they are indulged, they struggle for further indulgence; and every indulgence carnalizes the mind. The enlightened man knows, when he was under their influence, what struggles they made for absolute power; and this power he dare not permit them, because he knew they would jeopardize all his interests. For the sake of these he often had to restrain them, and to reduce them to subjection, after they had impelled him to riotous or selfish deeds. Among the restraints for them, are a kind which arise from the antagonism existing amongst the motives of human nature. This antagonism, be it remembered, was not implanted in man by the Creator; it has arisen from the dethronement of reason by the motives, and their seizure of the reins of government. It then being the case with them as with most rebellious subjects, that they are at times compelled to check and control each other. Hence the Christian will remember, that he had to curb his vanity by his pride — his sensuality by his shame — his riotous desires by his selfishness — his anger by his fear. And this, his experience, is the state of mind and life of carnal men.

But the tendency of Gospel motives, both in their inducements and principles, is to purify and spiritualize the heart. And in their case, it is the Christian who has to struggle to obtain for them absolute power; and from their workings in him he is persuaded, that their despotism would be his freedom — that their absolute reign in his soul would result in his perfect happiness here, and eternal life hereafter. Instead of their power endangering his interests, he knows that the natural consequence of this would be the advancement of his welfare. And these motives being guided and controlled by the Word of God, work in harmony with each other. Hence, then, the Christian has evidence within himself, that the Gospel principles and inducements are infinitely superior to those of human nature.

And let Christians consider what a change the instructions and motives of the Gospel have produced in their lives, and how they have promoted the welfare of themselves and connections.

Here is a disciple who, by nature, is vindictive. When in the world, he never forgot an insult or injury. If possible, it was instantaneously avenged; if not, it was kept in mind till a favorable opportunity came for retaliation. In consequence of this disposition he was a malignant neighbour, a dangerous friend, and a dreaded relative. But, becoming a Christian, the Gospel taught him the vileness and fearful consequences of his disposition, and by its motives impels and enables him to subdue the vindictive spirit. He now sees and feels the hellish nature of the temper, and keeps it in check. As the result, he is happier, his connections are free from apprehensions, and in himself and in his circle he is a blessed and elevated man. Now if he reflects, he will be indubitable evidence to himself, that the Gospel is divine. So the man whose selfish spirit and covetous habits have been subdued by religion, and a renovated heart prompting generous deeds established in their stead, has, in his own change, irresistible proof that the renovating power is not of man but of God.

But again: Christians, in these and all other instances, will sometimes have to struggle hard to keep the Gospel ascendant in their souls; and sometimes, perhaps, be overcome for a short time by their old passions. Then will follow remorse and mortification of heart.

Now this struggling, this remorse, this mortification, are themselves proofs of the holiness and power of the Christian system. Yes, Christian, the very wrestlings to keep down the impulses of your nature, prove that there are within you a number of pure and holy principles. For there was a time when you did not struggle to forgive your enemies—when you did not fight hard to be generous, benevolent, and holy; and as the accomplishment of these purposes is the perfection of man, it follows, that the system which now prompts and aids you thus to struggle is a perfect one. And there was a time when you felt no remorse, no vexation, at being vindictive, selfish, or at indulging in any other evil passion; and the fact that you do so now, is proof that there are super-human principles influencing and operating in your souls.

In order, however, that this internal evidence may be clear and strong within the Christian, he must daily crucify the flesh, with its affections and lusts, and daily cultivate the fruits of the Spirit.

Listen, then; in proportion as we are guided in thought and deed by the Gospel, in the same proportion we shall have within us irrefragable evidence of its truth.

To use the words of Jesus—"If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself."

Our course, then, is indicated, if we would stand in these days of apostasy and atheism. Those who pursue it, shall "hold on their way;" but the idle and careless in the Christian life are in danger of losing their "little faith." It is to be feared there are many in this state, and hence that there are many who have not convincing evidence within themselves, that the Bible is the Word of God; and hence, that there are many in danger of falling a prey to infidelity. "But, brethren, we hope better things of you;" and that better things may proceed from you, be advised to possess, by a holy heart and life, full evidence that your religion is divine.

SEARCH THE SCRIPTURES.

THE searching of the Scriptures has been, and will be, a topic on which many have and will write and speak, but which may, nevertheless, be dwelt upon again and again, without fear of lessening its importance in the minds of hearers or readers. In fact, the absence of that thorough research of Scripture, which is to be noticed amongst the whole Protestant as well Romanist body, is to be ascribed to the want of repeated exhortations to the duty, the privilege, and the right of every man to search the Scriptures. If, in the following remarks, any impulse should be given, either to those holding the faith in Christ, or to those of opposite views, whereby they may be led to look more closely into the Jewish or Christian records, an end will be attained tending to the profit of all parties concerned.

Let us first consider the teaching of the Scriptures on this subject.

Recalling the time when the Head of the Church, bearing the burden of men's sins, walked upon this earth, we hear him thus speaking to the Jews—"Search the Scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life; and they are they which testify of me." In this manner pointing out to them the witness which his Father had given to them, as to the truth and cause of his coming into the world to save men. By this standard they could test the reality of his statements as to his mission from God, and the truthfulness of his life as to his obedience to the law given by Moses. This testimony is still available to all, so that all may freely be convinced respecting the character and purpose of Christ's manifestation. It becometh, then, every man to search for his own conviction the Jewish records, so that he may perceive the unison between the testimony on the one hand, and the life of Christ on the other.

In another passage of Scripture, Luke xvi. 29-31, we have placed before us by the Saviour a truth, that if the Jews would not be persuaded by Moses and the Prophets, they would not be persuaded by any other means. From this we may fairly conclude that if men, like the Jews in the time of Christ, will not hear the testimony of the Scriptures concerning the kingdom of Christ, they will not, like the Jews also, be persuaded by other influences. And not only can this conclusion be drawn, but one of far greater importance, namely, that no other means will be given than those already in the possession of men for their guidance, and for a testimony concerning Christ's kingdom; therefore, the necessity of searching the Scriptures is rendered the more apparent.

In the account of the Acts of the Apostles, we have a memorial and an example set before us, which should excite our emulation as well as admiration. It is recorded by the Spirit, that the Jews of Berea "were more noble than those in Thessalonica, in that they received the word with all readiness of mind, and searched the Scriptures daily, whether those things were so." We have here commended by the Spirit men who, receiving the words of inspired men, yet thought it necessary to test the truth of their assertions by a searching of the Jewish Scriptures. If, then, inspired men had their statements tested by uninspired men, it ill becomes any man, naming himself a Christian, not to test the statements of uninspired men of the present day. It would be well for all to imitate the example of these Jews, and instead of depending upon the words of any man, or body of men, to depend alone upon the records of truth.

The Apostle Paul, in his second letter to Timothy, sets forth the usefulness of Scripture in strong terms. He states that it is "profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, completely fitted for every good work." According to this statement—which, although Paul's, is Paul's under the direction of the Spirit—the Scriptures are available for every purpose for which the Christian, during his stay on earth, may require them; therefore, any other support said to be necessary for the maintenance of the Christian, or Christ's system, is not needful. Any other writings must be submitted to the test of the Scriptures, and rejected or received according to the measure of their agreement.

Leaving the testimony of Scripture, and seeking the opinions of men as to the necessity of searching them, we are constrained to state, that the most notable writers of the early Christian church, to the commencement of the fifth century, urge, advise, and solicit the attention of men to the sources of light and truth. And even amidst the darkness of the Latin reign, gleams of light are discovered, proving that some men still held firm to the records of the Spirit. Passing, however, these records of history, and recognizing the claims of the Lollards, the Moravian brethren, the Huguenots, and the Waldenses to be heard on the question, we would more particularly direct our notice to the opinions advanced by the Romanist, the Established, and the Nonconformist professing Christian bodies.

In order to shew how far the liberty of searching the Scriptures was and is regarded by the Church of Rome, we cannot do better than notice the manner in which the Jansenists were treated by the Pope. The Jansenists in France held opinions which men in these days would call evangelical. They were, in fact, Protestants sheltering themselves from persecution under the cloak of Roman Catholicism. Prior to the reign of Louis XIV. of France, they had increased largely in that country. As soon as that monarch began to reign, the Jesuits, who had been obliged to succumb to them previously, gradually regained strength, and at last succeeded in obtaining a bull from the Pope, which condemned the principles held by the Jansenists. This bull, known as the Bull Unigenitus, issued by Clement XI. in 1713, contained a condemned proposition, held by the Jansenists, which runs as follows:—"It is useful and necessary, at all times, in all places, for all sorts of persons, to study the Scriptures." No Christian can say more, nor can he be content with less; therefore, there can be no union between the Christian and Rome.

The teaching of the Established Church of England can be best gleaned from its writings. The first sermon in the First Book of Homilies is entitled, "A Fruitful Exhortation to the Reading and Knowledge of Holy Scripture;" a portion of which we give in the following sentences. "Therefore, forsaking the corrupt judgments of fleshly men, which care not but for their carcase; let us reverently hear and read Holy Scripture, which is the food of the soul. Let us diligently search for the well of life in the books of the New and Old Testaments, and not run to the stinking puddles of men's traditions, devised by men's imagination, for our justification and salvation." "Ignorance of God's Word is the cause of all error, as Christ himself affirmed to the Sadducees, saying, that they erred, because they knew not the Scripture." "The humble man may search any truth boldly in the Scripture without fear of error, and if he be ignorant, he ought the more to read and to search Holy Scripture, to bring him out of ignorance." "And those things in the Scripture that be plain to understand, and necessary for salvation, every man's duty is to learn them, to print them in memory, and effectually to exercise them." So far, then, nothing can be plainer than the expressed opinion of the Church of England.

We cannot do better in enunciating the opinions of Nonconformists, than by giving the statements of two of that body. The first is the Rev. J. Cumming, D.D. In commenting on the church at Berea, in his readings on the Acts of the Apostles, he thus writes: "But some would say, Why, the result of this exercise of private judgment must be universal heresy; for surely if the laity are to bring an Apostle preaching to the Scriptures, and to test all by God's written Word, the result will be shocking: they will fall into divisions, disputes, and heresy. The exercise of private judgment has been the root of all mischief. But the record is very different; the historical fact proves the reverse: for it is added, 'Therefore, many of them believed.' What therefore? Because they searched whether these things were so, therefore they did not fall into heresy, but therefore they believed—"many of them; and honorable women," who were so audacious as to search the Scriptures, to see whether these things were so when an Apostle preached."

Our second writer is the Rev. F. Wayland, D.D. who, in his Sermons to the Churches, as given in the Baptist Messenger for May, 1859, page 126, thus writes:—"The laws of the society of Christ control the conscience." "They are found in the New Testament, and consist of the precepts which have been committed to us by Christ and his

Apostles. "But it may be asked, Who shall interpret for us the precepts of Christ? We answer, Christ has appointed no interpreter. He has told us that every one must give himself unto God. The New Testament is a message from God to every individual, and every individual, seeking the truth in humility and prayer, is an interpreter unto himself. He must, in the fear of God, learn from the written revelation what God requires of him; and, so seeking, he will be taught all necessary truth."

The foregoing, it is presumed, will be sufficient to shew that the generality of professing Christians agree in recommending the utterance of the Saviour, "Search the Scriptures." Although condemned by the Church of Rome, is this liberty, in its fulness; yet the priests of its appointment can permit those persons in its communion to read it whom they think are fit. The question, however, which arises in the mind, when looking at this matter, takes a form somewhat as follows: How is it, though these different bodies point out the duty of searching the Scriptures, that we see so great a want of compliance in their members? We will endeavour to point out a, if not the reason. For this purpose we will take the Church of England as a medium, whereby we may obtain a solution.

The third constitution, of the constitutions and canons ecclesiastical of the Church of England, reads thus:—"The Church of England a true and Apostolical Church.—Whosoever shall hereafter affirm, that the Church of England by law established under the King's Majesty, is not a true and apostolical church, teaching and maintaining the doctrine of the apostles; let him be excommunicated ipso facto, and not restored, but only by the Archbishop, after his repentance and public revocation of this his wicked error." See also succeeding constitutions. We may only stay to say, that establishment by law of man and law of Christ, are two different things.

It has been shewn elsewhere that this church exhorts men to study the Scriptures, but it seems that it has, at the same time, a mental reservation; for, should any man, after studying the Scriptures, come to a different conclusion than this church by law established, he would ipso facto be turned out of the church. But thanks be unto God, that men are to be found who search the Scriptures, without troubling themselves about churches by law established expelling them, so long as they get nearer the law of Christ.

It is this principle of conformity to the opinions of the church, in defiance of the conscience of the man, that interposes a greater or less obstacle to the free search of the Scriptures. If the advice of these bodies was given fairly, it would be done after this fashion—"Search the Scriptures, but take care that the result of your search is complete agreement with our opinions."

This is the prominent feature of the Church of Rome, from whom it was transmitted to the Church of England, and from thence scattered amongst the Non-conformist bodies of this country.

When men generally take this lesson to heart, and search the Scriptures diligently, to see whether these things are so, they will have less need to be told of their deficiencies. Their dependence upon men who have been trained in a systematic theory, or course of preconceived notions, will be then little indeed. The true college for Christians is the church of Christ. Provision is made in the system of Christ for meeting the requirements of its members, so that all may be edified, and increase in the knowledge of the glorious Gospel of Christ. The leaders of Christ's flock will and must, if there is any vitality in Christ's system, spring from the body of the church. The position of that man who, possessing knowledge, or the mind for acquiring knowledge, and yet will use neither for the benefit of the members of Christ's church, will not be envied when he renders an account of the deeds done in his body to his Master.

Strive, then, brethren—search the Scriptures—emulate each other in the good work—resist every one who takes from you the privilege which Christ has given you, of searching for the truth as it is in him. "Ask, and it shall be given; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you." Opened to you as it is not opened to trained schismatics, who, upholding systems, forget Christ and his laws. Let it be said of every true church of Christ meeting in this land, "They search the Scriptures, depending not on men, fol-owing not blind guides, but the inspired Oracles of God ;" and the result will be, a silent but strong movement in the cause of Christ. In conclusion, if any think lightly of this searching of the Scriptures, or of the gospel therein contained, let them recall the words of the Apostle Paul, "Though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel than that which ye have received, let him be accursed."

RELIGIOUS CONTROVERSY.—No. II.

"But foolish and untaught questions avoid, knowing that they do gender strifes, And the servant of the Lord must not strive; but be gentle unto all men, apt to teach, patient: in meekness instructing those that oppose themselves; if God, peradventure, will give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth" (2 Tim. ii. 23, 24.)

WE have seen that, in the present condition of man, controversy is a necessity. When confined to its just measure, and to its legitimate subjects, and conducted in the right spirit, it is eminently useful in the defence and maintenance of truth. On the other hand, if not thus restricted and guided, it becomes an evil of great magnitude, creating interminable discords, enmities, and strifes. That religious controversy had grown to be such an evil, was decided in the very beginning of this religious movement; and it was the primary object of those engaged in it, to devise some plan by which religious controversy could be restrained within proper limits, and by which the scandalous strifes and divisions of religious society, engendered and perpetuated by these abuses of controversy, could be amicably terminated. They endeavored, therefore, to discover some common ground of union for believers; some basis of fellowship and fraternity upon which all might be brought together, without doing violence to the conscience of any one, or compromising a single valuable truth. The basis they found in the Bible, correctly interpreted in conformity to the established laws of language; and it was, therefore, proposed to discard everything in religion but Bible things, and to agree to call Bible things by Bible names. In other words, it was determined that nothing should be regarded as a matter of faith or duty, unless there could be produced in its behalf a "Thus saith the Lord," either in express terms, necessary implication, or approved precedent. Everything thus sanctioned by Scripture was to be received as settled — as a matter of faith, hope, or obedience. Everything not thus sanctioned, was to be regarded as a matter of opinion—a matter in regard to which there was to be no controversy or disputation, each individual holding his opinions as private property, and being at liberty to form and entertain whatever views he pleased in relation to all such subjects of thought or inquiry.

This overture for peace and union, it is well known, has met with a success which, for the time, is without example since the first planting of Christianity. It has thus succeeded, not only because it is so obviously proper in itself, and so well calculated to reduce to their just insignificance the principal subjects of religious dissection; but, because, as an immediate result of taking the Scriptures as the only guide, it has shewn clearly what Christianity was at the beginning, and the Gospel has thus been again presented to the world in its primitive simplicity, and with all its original power to save. The importance, then, of adhering steadfastly to the great principle of this religious reformation, and of keeping it constantly prominent, will not be questioned by any of its friends.

It seems to me important to dwell upon it, at the present, especially, as it is difficult to account for the zeal manifested in the defence and propagation of certain views or opinions amongst us, except on the hypothesis that their advocates have wholly misconceived, in one or more important respects, the light in which opinions are regarded in the Reformation, or the essential nature of opinions themselves. Some would seem to labor under the mistake that the Reformation, in rejecting all human opinions, thereby intends to assert that said opinions are untrue. No such position was ever taken. The rejection of opinions was not based upon their falsity, but upon the simple fact that they were opinions. They might be either true or false — in some cases they must be true ; (for contradictory opinions are both rejected alike, yet if one be false, the other, in some cases, must be true) still, as human opinions, and destitute of the authority of Divine revelation, they can form no part of the basis of the present Reformation. One individual may think that the dead are conscious of happiness or misery before the resurrection : another that they are wholly unconscious. One or the other of these opinions must be true, yet neither can be a matter of faith, nor a subject of disputation, nor a test of fellowship, according to the principles of the Reformation. The same may be said with regard to all opinions about unrevealed things, past, present, and future, whenever they involve the only possible alternatives. But some seem to have supposed that the Reformation denounces all opinions as false, and to have been led, under the influence of this mistake, to endeavour to establish the truth of the favourite notions they hold on various subjects. These persons labour in vain, however ; for could they ever satisfy the minds of all that their opinions are true, these would not, on that account, be at all less worthy of rejection as a part of the basis of Christian union. Let such individuals, then, enjoy their opinions in peace, under the assurance that the Reformation does not concern itself at all about them, nor deem them even of sufficient importance to question their correctness. The subjects, indeed, to which these opinions relate, may be of the highest importance ; but the opinions themselves, as such, must ever be wholly valueless. It is highly probable, that out of the multitude of conjectures and opinions entertained by the pious respecting the state of things in Eden — the nature of angels — the coming of Christ — the future state, &c. — many may be found correct hereafter, when the facts shall be made known by authority, or realized by experience. As, at present, however, it is impossible thus to verify them, and they constitute no part of revelation, they are to us all equally apocryphal. A knowledge of the things to which they relate is doubtless wisely withheld from man in his present state, as being to him now either practically useless or actually injurious, however important or necessary it may be hereafter. All such speculations, therefore, upon the principles of the present Reformation, are to be laid aside, upon the simple ground that we have, at present, nothing to do with them ; that all such " secret things belong to the Lord our God ; but those things which are revealed belong unto us and to our children for ever."

There is, however, another mistake, much more common, and much more difficult to avoid than the one of which I have spoken, and that is, the confounding of matters of opinion with the things of faith. It is not always an easy task to discriminate between a matter of opinion and a matter of faith. It is, indeed, always easy to ask, " Does the Scripture teach it ?" But it is not every one that can give a true answer to this question. To one, it will appear to be clearly taught in Scripture : to another, the contradictory is equally clear from the Bible. A third may derive, as he thinks, from the same authority, a view of the same subject differing from both the others. This is, in fact, the actual state of affairs in religious society, and it is obvious that there can be no unity of sentiment established until the causes of this diversity can be removed ; and in order to be removed, they must first be clearly comprehended, though it must be admitted that even a clear knowledge of their nature will sometimes prove insufficient, for who can remove the errors of the heart ? Who can teach rectitude to the perverse and stubborn will ! Nevertheless, it will be useful at least to point out the chief sources of existing evils, and to direct the reader to the remedy proposed in the present Reformation.

In the former case, we have supposed opinions to be truly recognized as such, and their defence to be undertaken because their truth is supposed to be challenged. Here persons acknowledge no limitations to their investigations. They regard themselves justifiable in pushing their inquiries wholly beyond the bounds of revelation, and as committed to the proof of the theories they advance. Of this character are the bold speculations concerning the Divine essence — the covenants of eternity — the nature of the human soul—the state of the dead &c. in the discussion of which, men rely upon human reason—upon philosophy, metaphysics, physiology, but not upon the Bible. In the present case, however, we have opinions which are mistaken for matters of revelation. Men honestly suppose the Scriptures to teach doctrines diametrically opposed, and in defending them, they oppose scripture to scripture, and authority to authority. A thousand questions are started, of which it is taken for granted the Scriptures treat, and in the discussion of which, they are quoted, when, in reality, the points at issue have never been mooted, much less decided, in the Bible, and when the passages adduced from it have relation to matters widely different from those to which they are thus misapplied. In not a few cases of this error, too, there is a blending of opinion with faith—a perversion of the truth actually revealed, by some opinion incorporated with it, and sustained, as before, by some false gloss, or misinterpretation of Scripture. In these, and many other cases, it is sometimes difficult to distinguish truth from error; and faith, or genuine Scripture knowledge, from human opinion. For the most part, however, a pure version, and a correct application of Scripture, will enable the lover of truth to detect such fallacies, and hence the present Reformation, in requiring Scripture proof for everything belonging to faith or duty, requires that Scripture shall be correctly understood and applied according to the established laws of language. The analogy of faith being observed, and the Scripture being made its own interpreter, all difficulty and misapprehension in these cases will speedily be removed, at least so far as all important matters are concerned. In regard to these, there is so great an abundance and variety of evidence, that the sincere inquirer after truth will find it easy to distinguish the wheat of Divine revelation from the chaff of human opinion-

ism. It is chiefly in those cases, where the Scripture affords but little evidence, that any real difficulty arises. These, however, are happily cases in which minor points only are in question, in regard to which Christians may well exercise that patience and forbearance with each other which becomes their profession.

In order, then, to find a proper answer to the question, What do the Scriptures teach? it is only necessary to study them in the right spirit and with the necessary diligence. He who has learned to renounce himself—his own theories—his self-confidence—his ambition and his egotism: he who leans not to his own understanding, but commits himself unreservedly to the guidance of God's Word, and meditates therein day and night, he it is who will find that word able to make him "wise unto salvation" and "thoroughly furnished unto every good work." And, finally, when a proper answer is thus found to the question, What do the Scriptures teach? in reference to any given subject, we are at once enabled to discriminate between this revealed truth, and any opinions which may have been associated with it. This discrimination being made, there is at once an end of controversy. The ascertained sense of Scripture settles what is to be believed, and opinion, deprived of all authority, sinks at once into insignificance. It is the Bible that can alone be the basis of a true religious reformation. It is the Bible, which, though once chained in the monastery at Erfurt, had power to set the soul of Luther free, and issuing forth from the prison of the cloister, to shed its light abroad over the nations—it is the Bible which has power to free itself from the shackles which Protestant opinionism has since imposed upon it, and to resume its original and rightful authority over the hearts, and lives, and consciences of men. ### THE DISCIPLES—WHO AND WHAT ARE THEY?

A SHORT time ago, a document well stored with incorrect statements relative to the Disciples, penned by a clergyman of the Presbyterian church, was published in The Commercial, a paper which appears at Huron, Michigan. To this document Bro. D. OLIPHANT responded in the articles which we append.

RESPONSE I.

One month ago, an epistle appeared in The Commercial, touching the people who take the name, "Disciples of Christ." The epistle was written, I am informed, by a gentleman who ministers as a clergyman, and signs himself C. S. Being one of the much-spoken against Disciples, you will perhaps allow me to note down sundry items pertaining to the Disciples, soliciting your readers to compare the utterance of Friend C. S. with what is thus offered.

1. The brethren who are termed Disciples, instead of rallying round a famed man as their founder, take pleasure in hearkening to Jesus, as their Divine Founder and Leader. Speaking of the Disciples, Mr. C. S. is pleased to say, that "the founder of this sect was originally a Presbyter, but withdrew from that church in 1812." The Lord Jesus was never, I believe, a Presbyter, in the usual sense of the term; and never, therefore, withdrew from the Presbyterian church either in 1812 or any other year, previously or subsequently.

2. As the Disciples of the Redeemer were made and preserved originally without uninspired formulas, but were born and nourished through the love and legislation of Christ through inspired ministers, the Disciples in this century, as in the first century, accept the form of sound words given by inspiration, without the aid of words of man's wisdom formulated into a confession.

3. Believing that there were no denominations, or diverse bodies of Christian worshippers, when the Gospel was first heralded to the nations, but all were one body, under the government of one Lord, the Disciples aim so to stand upon the original ground, and so to work under the Chief Captain, as to induce all true and teachable men to reject partizan teaching and customs, and unite upon the common salvation of the Divine Head.

4. If, then, the Disciples are a sect—thereby signifying a partizan people—as Mr. C. S. intimates, it is very foreign to devoutly cherished purposes, and adverse to every avowed principle.

5. With reference to what is usually styled regeneration, the Disciples read in the standard creed, that those who heard Christ preached, who believed in him, who thereby were "pierced to the heart," and who repented of their sins and put on Christ—thus showing a changed mind and heart, and entering a changed state, in order to an amended life—were at first accounted the new created in Christ; and such persons in this age are regarded by the Disciples as the people who follow Jesus, by following the apostles, "in the regeneration," or dispensation of the new creation of which he is Lord, Head, and Hero. Mr. C. S. writes these words, "Orthodox denominations believe in a change of heart, or scriptural conversion; the Disciples believe no such thing." This statement, which fails to carry the essential element of truth, may have been made, let me hope, in charity, from lack of knowledge, and not from want of candor.

The gentleman engages in the task of drawing a comparison between the Baptists and Disciples, not omitting to advertize the superior article of orthodoxy which distinguishes the one, and the discount or counterfeit which characterizes the other. I incline to review this comparison, believing that it may pay cost; but, for reasons satisfactory to myself, it seems proper to put my notes upon this part of his epistle in a separate chapter, in the form of a letter solely consecrated to this purpose, with the full conviction that heavenly wisdom purifies and unites men, while earthly wisdom is both carnal and divisional.

RESPONSE II.

While giving a heedful ear to the comparison or contrast Mr. C. S. draws between worshippers calling themselves Baptists, and worshippers calling themselves Disciples, I am induced to make a twin inquiry. Are we favoured in this country with a standard of model people, and are the Baptist friends this standard people? And if the answer be affirmative, follow it not that all who are unlike these model neighbours are to that extent astray, and all who are like them to that degree exemplary? How would such a position suit neighbour C. S.? for it is said he is identified with the brotherhood of Presbyterians, wherein may be found as reliable orthodoxy as America can boast; yet how wide the difference between them and Baptists.

"I affirm," says the reviewing friend, "I affirm that there is a great difference between the doctrine and faith of the Baptist denomination and those of the so-called Disciples." No question of it: provided we have in our eye, not a Hebrew of the Hebrews, but a Regular so intense that he is more Baptist than Christian, as a specimen of the "denomination" to which my friend refers. I, for one, desire a wide margin to intervene between popular Regulars and Regular Disciples. But those Baptists we read of, who lived and who died to the Lord Jesus, and all brethren Baptists at this date who imitate them as they imitated Christ, are such friends as take the same creed, obey the same Redeemer, possess the same spirit, and have the same reformatory aim as the friends called Disciples. They are substantially one people, and whether all know it or not, they are fervently engaged in the one work of reform under Messiah.

"The Disciples make baptism by immersion a saving ordinance," says neighbour C. S.; and then he adds, "Neither the Baptists nor any other evangelical denomination hold such doctrine, but have charity to believe that one may get to heaven without immersion." [Concerning reaching heaven without immersion, I speak not now.]

Quite true, the Disciples teach that every institution ordained by Jesus is saving. God perfected the world of naturals and the world of spirituals by putting in them saving ordinances. A non-saving ordinance the Lord never made. Any ordinance, therefore, that is not saving, is not from heaven. Daylight is a saving ordinance, and the light from above, as it shines in the government which is of grace, is, I am happy to know, saving. Preaching, prayer, the feast entitled the Lord's Supper, liberality in giving, as also faith and immersion, are, in their appropriate places, the Disciples believe, divinely suited to save. Without fee or reward, I could freely give my right, title, and interest in all non-saving ordinances to those who may need them. Such are of no service to any Disciple, as far as is known to me.

It is affirmed that Baptists do not hold that baptism is saving. Some of them, no doubt, strip to a skeleton, having a form without the power, and grow lean in attending to what possesses no grace of God. Others manfully avow, with the author of salvation, that faith and the obedience of faith, by an initiatory burial and resurrection with Christ, are joined inseparably, in order to full participation in the present salvation. With the greater number of Baptists, this ordinance saves a man from alienship or non-membership; for they count no one a member with them, nor give him a place at their altar of communion, until he adds to his faith immersion. So far, at least, it is a saving ordinance with very many friends called Baptist.

Let me not spend too much of the reader's time in asking what is meant by the expression, "baptism by immersion." There are pious men who tell us that baptism signifies sprinkling. But "sprinkling by immersion" would not be such English as a scholar could approve. Pouring is given as a correct definition. Try that. "Pouring by immersion." No correct friend would be willing to father this expression. Then there are perpendicular people who gravely say that baptism means immersion. But to speak of a man being "immersed by immersion" is like telling us of one who is wedded by wedlock or buried by burial.

The Disciples, he says, "require of their candidates for immersion only a simple trust or reliance on Christ." He testifies that Disciples believe not in a change of heart, requiring only simple reliance on Christ. I would be pleased to know what friend C. S. means by these statements. Does he intend to signify that reliance on Christ, whether simple or compound, is possible without a change of heart? Did he ever find a man relying on Christ whose heart was NOT CHANGED? At this moment memory does not call up a contradiction more palpable in two statements so near together as that now noted. First, it is stated that Disciples believe not in a change of heart. Next, it is affirmed they require reliance on Christ. Is there any other friend in this or any other county who will hint that a man can rely on the Lord Jesus, and remain unchanged in feeling, unchanged in purpose, unchanged in heart, unchanged in life?

church discipline." And then it is affirmed, "THE DISCIPLES HAVE NEITHER." My pen must not pause to criticize "neither of three," for it is not the grammatical correctness, but the truthfulness of the statement that I desire to test. Popular Baptists have creeds—not one, but two; the Bible forming one, and articles drawn up by themselves forming another. The Disciples are satisfied with one creed, drawn up, arranged, perfected, signed, and sealed for authoritative reference by the living Spirit. So soon as it is ascertained reliably, that a perfect creed calls for an imperfect creed to aid it, the Disciples will follow the example of devout neighbours, and secure a second creed. But to say the Disciples have no creed, when the Sacred Writings are received as such, demands a boldness of utterance, or shows a degree of non-information seldom exceeded.

Friend C. S. assures the community, that the people he opposes are without a bond of union. He omits the proof. Let me exercise the right of a Disciple of Jesus in calling for the evidence. Truth, pure from the mint of inspiration, moulded and clothed with heavenly love, once united the Disciples of the Lord. The love of Jesus constrained them. The law of Jesus was their joy. Then, indeed, love was law, and law was love; and these constituted, and do now constitute, the union bond of Disciples.

Of church discipline the Disciples have none, says Mr. C. S. Does he mean the Lord's disciple—the disciple appointed and approved by Jesus? Church discipline sounds quite too much like what is heard in a city upon seven hills, in a super-orthodox spot in Europe. The church over in that quarter, exercises very robust discipline.

Witness its pungent correctives in prisons and inquisitions, shaped and controlled by tallest and broadest orthodoxy. But the Lord, in his word of truth, speaking as he does by his servants, the Apostles and Prophets, furnishes admonition, warning, and reproof, and thus guides His own people as their condition may require. With such discipline the Lord's Disciples are indeed blessed.

One word upon the charity that certifies men into heaven without submission to Christ's institutions. This is a chapter of things that Disciples have allowed to remain untouched. The Christian ordinances, one and all of them, minister the blessings of the redemption now enjoyable; a redemption, it is true, that points with a hopeful eye to a more perfect redemption. To partake at the Lord's table in order to enter heaven, or be immersed to secure the salvation "yet to be revealed," would be as unauthorized as the devout effort to substract total depravity by a ceremony from an innocent babe. Should it be conceded that millions may participate in the salvation embraced in the coming state, without attending now to one ordinance of the Christian religion, or without even knowing the name of Christ, the position is still tenable, that salvation proposed by Jesus in the present state, can only be enjoyed by those who yield to it as divinely offered; and it is equally tenable to affirm that only those who continue to live the life of faith, have the happiness to be able to prove their eternal salvation.

May Heaven's favor rest abundantly on all who love Jesus supremely. For the truth, the entire truth of God, carrying with it purity and unity,

OUR WANTS.

NEVER since the dawn of the current Reformation has the cause been in as good a condition as it is at the present time. Wherever the brethren are living in peace, and faithfully attending to the ordinances of the Lord's house, they are fast rising in the estimation of the people. Indeed, men of the world, in many localities, regard us as being far in advance of the denominations by which we are surrounded. Wherever the gospel is proclaimed in its ancient purity, by faithful and devoted men, for a sufficient length of time, sinners are seen bowing to the authority of Jesus; and many are forsaking their human platforms, and taking their stand with us upon the foundation that God has laid in Zion. Nearly everywhere there is a desire on the part of the masses to hear the plain story of the cross, and the truths elicited by A. Campbell and his associates have modified, to a wonderful extent, the views and practices of nearly all denominations. We have grown to be a great people — we have performed a great work—we have no cause for discouragement. But it would be arrogating too much to ourselves to say that we have arrived at that state of perfection required by the Word of God. We live in houses of clay, whose foundation is in the dust; we are surrounded by wicked men, and we are subject to the temptations of the great adversary of souls. Consequently our progress towards Christian perfection is somewhat slow, and the necessity for exhortation and practical instruction is urgent. Permit me, then, dear brethren, to call your attention to some of our wants.

I. We want more personal piety. The body of Christ is made up of individual churches, and each church is made up of individual members. And, consequently, the body at large must partake of the character of its members. As a people, we cannot be characterized for piety and devotion, without piety and devotion on the part of our members, as individuals. Then let every member of the body of Christ, into whose hands this article may fall, instead of murmuring against others, and finding fault with them for a want of piety, begin with himself, and ask himself the following questions: "Do I realize as I should, that it is in the Lord that I live and move and have my existence, and that all my temporal blessings flow from him? Am I impressed as I should be with a sense of my own sinfulness and reliance on Jesus? Do I adore and reverence the Lord, and is my heart filled with gratitude to him, in view of his condescending mercy and his works of benevolence towards a fallen and guilty world? Do I habitually engage in prayer and thanksgiving, and do I take delight in meditating on the goodness of the Lord, the sacrifice of Jesus, and the beauties of the great plan of redemption? Is my place in the Lord's house regularly filled; and when there, is my heart in the services, or am I only a careless spectator? Do I possess that ardent devotion to Christ, and that unwavering attachment to his cause, that characterized the early Christians, and led them to follow the Saviour at the sacrifice of all earthly enjoyment?"

My brother, or my sister, if you can answer these questions to the satisfaction of a conscience enlightened by the Word of God, you have only to hold fast your fidelity, and to press forward in the way of holiness. But if not, it is high time for you to awake out of sleep.

II. We want a greater effort on the part of parents to educate their children in the Christian religion. The minds of children are more impressible than those of older persons, and the impressions made upon the mind in childhood are more permanent than those made at a more advanced age. In proof of the latter position, I refer to the well-known truth, that old persons often relate with great facility incidents that occurred in their childhood, while incidents that occurred at a later period have been entirely forgotten. Youth is the seed-time of life, and whatsoever a man sows, that shall he also reap. Hence the great necessity of sowing in youth the seeds of virtue and piety, instead of the seeds of vice and immorality. Alas, how many young men are seen walking the streets of our large towns and cities, dressed in broad-cloth, with pipes and cigars in their mouths, who have, most unhappily, apparently no object in view save the gratification of the senses and passions! In childhood they were permitted to be governed by passion, and the intellect and heart were neglected; and now the mind is uninformed, the conscience slumbers, and the passions reign predominant. It seems to be almost impossible to bring to bear upon their minds the saving influences of the Gospel, and consequently their case seems hopeless. We, as a people, have adopted the correct principle that persons do not become Christians in a moment, by a miraculous influence of the Spirit; but that the work of conversion is effected by means of the word of truth, and in harmony with the laws of our nature. When those who hold the doctrine that conversion is wholly the work of the Lord, and that all means on the part of man are unnecessary, neglect the moral training of their children, it is not to be wondered at; for their practice is in harmony with their theory. But is it not strange that persons who believe that the Lord converts men through means, neglect the use of those means, and yet expect the work to be effected? Brethren of the Reformation, turn your attention to the moral culture of your children. Inspire them with a love for the Lord's Word, the Lord's-day, and the Lord's house; and teach them honesty, industry, and politeness. By politeness I mean not elegance and precision in the ball-room, nor yet ease and gentility in the parlour—although the latter I would not depreciate—but I mean such conduct as is required by the golden rule, and always characterizes the true gentleman, whether he is among the rich, the fashionable and the gay, or the poor, the oppressed, and the afflicted. If you wish to see your children immoral, clownish, and inhuman, when they shall have grown up to be men and women, let them do as they please in childhood. But if not, instruct them and bring them under wholesome restraint.

III. We want more of the spirit of self-sacrifice. Many members of the church act upon the principle that every man has a right to do as he pleases, regardless of the will of the Lord. They seem not to think that they are required to make sacrifices of their time, their property, and their ease, for the advancement of the Lord's cause, and for the glory of his name. They seem to think it all well enough for persons to spend their time in the service of the Lord when they have nothing else to do, to give of their means for the support of the Gospel when all their own wants are supplied, and to attend the house of the Lord when they feel to like it; but the idea that Christians are required to make sacrifices for the cause of Christ, seems never to have entered their minds. Many seem to have lost sight of the great truth, that the Christian religion was founded in sacrifice—even the sacrifice of the wealth, the honors, the happiness, and the life of the Son of God. Though he was rich, yet for our sakes he became poor; he took upon him the form of a servant, and made himself of no reputation. In the Garden of Olives his soul was exceedingly sorrowful, even unto death; and on the rugged cross he gave his life a ransom for sinners. O, thou Son of God, thou Saviour of men, didst thou drink of the bitter waters of affliction and sorrow, that we might satiate our sinful desires in pleasure, and ride through the world on the current of popularity! Didst thou leave thy glorious habitation, and endure that awful agony, and die that shameful death, that we might sail to heaven on flowery beds of ease! No! we are required to perpetuate and sustain our holy religion by sacrifice—the same means by which it was brought into existence. If we would follow Christ we must deny ourselves—if we would reign with him we must suffer with him—and if we would gain immortality, and be where the ransomed of the Lord shall for ever dwell, amid scenes of surpassing beauty and objects of the highest pleasure, we must walk in the footsteps of those holy men who followed the Saviour through evil as well as good report.

IV. We want more unity of feeling and action on the part of some of our preachers. The Saviour, in that dark and gloomy hour when the sins of the world hung heavy upon him, turned his attention to the sorrow-stricken disciples around him and prayed for their unity. And then, with an eye to the future interests of the church, and a heart overflowing with benevolence for the world, he prayed for the unity of believers in every age and every clime. This prayer surely includes preachers of the Gospel at the present day. When a number of men engage in any great work, unity of purpose and of action is indispensable in order to success. In unity there is strength; but in division there is weakness. We have engaged in a great work—we have endeavoured to elevate the Bible to its proper position in the minds of our fellow-men; and, because we have been united, our efforts have been crowned with unparalleled success. And if the Reformation ever triumphs over every opposition—and I believe it will—it will triumph through the unity of its advocates. The preachers of the Reformation have, with great ability and zeal, for more than a quarter of a century, proclaimed to the world the great necessity of unity among the people of God, and the all-sufficiency of the Bible to effect and perpetuate that unity.

But, brethren, the Bible will not perpetuate unity among us unless we follow its teachings, and possess that spirit of love and forbearance that it enjoins upon us. We should receive one another without regard to differences of opinion, and be careful not to preach and magnify our opinions and parade them before the public to the injury of the cause, but preach the word of the truth of the Gospel. And, finally, we should all walk worthy of the high vocation wherewith we are called, with all lowliness and meekness, with long suffering, forbearing one another in love; endeavouring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. Let us turn our weapons of warfare against the great adversary of souls, and labor for the upbuilding of the saints and the conversion of the world. Behold! the fields are now white for the harvest, and the laborers are few. Thousands are ignorant of the way of life, eternal ruin threatens them, their only refuge is in the Lord, and their only hope of escape is in the Gospel of his grace. Then, let us publish abroad the message of life and salvation while it is day, for the night cometh in which no man can work.

BENGEL ON BAPTISM.

MANY brethren will feel obliged by having collected the notes of this famed critic on Baptism. The following extracts are believed to include all his more striking remarks on this subject.

Mat. iii. 6.—“At the baptism of repentance men confessed their sins; at the baptism of Christ they confessed Christ.”

Mat. xxviii. 19. — “Into the name. This formula of baptism is most solemn and important; in fact, it embraces the sum of all piety. [Note.] At the baptism of Christ Jesus Himself, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost manifested themselves. The entire sum of saving knowledge and doctrine is bound up with baptism; and all the ancient creeds and confessions of faith, are in fact a periphrasis and working-out of this incomparably momentous formula of baptism.”

Mark i. 7.—“To unloose the latchet. We usually make fast our shoes with buckles, the ancients with thongs or strings. John seems by this proverbial saying, perhaps unconsciously, to make allusion to the baptism of Jesus, so as to express this meaning: I am not worthy to unloose His shoe-strings, much less to impart baptism to Him. For the shoes also, as well as the garments, used to be taken off when a person was to be baptized.”

Mark x. 38.—“The cup, the baptism. To drink this cup was difficult (as often death itself is taken in the act of drinking.) Baptism also, among the Jews, was a thing to be shuddered at, inasmuch as the whole body was dipped in a stream, however cold. Accordingly, by both words, the passion of Christ is denoted: by the cup, His inward passion; the cup is therefore placed first: by the baptism, chiefly his external passion. He was distended inwardly with his passion (referring to the cup; He was filled with the cup of anguish): He was covered over (as a person baptized is with water) with his passion. Moreover, both are appropriately employed; for they who take the sacraments, are partakers of the baptism and the cup of Christ (1 Cor. xii. 13): and the baptism of Christ and our baptism, as also the Holy Supper, have a close connection with Christ's passion and death, and with ours also.”

Mark xvi. 16, “And that is baptized. Whosoever once believes, is wont to receive baptism. He who believeth not—those who did not believe, did not receive baptism.”

Luke iii. 3. — “Jordan. A river suited for baptism in.”

John iii. 3-4. — “The sense here is: That opinion of thine, Nicodemus, as to Jesus is not sufficient: it is needful that you absolutely believe, and submit yourself to the heavenly ordinance, even baptism. Compare Mark xvi. 16, ‘He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved.’ This was the doctrine necessary for Nicodemus.” “Water denotes the baptism of John into Christ Jesus, verses 22, 23, which baptism the colleagues of Nicodemus, by omitting, v. 1, despised the counsel of God (Luke vii. 30).” “The necessity of regeneration primarily, and of baptism secondarily, is here confirmed.”

John iii. 23.—“Many (waters.) So the rite of immersion required.”

Acts viii. 38. — “What doth hinder. He was prepared and eager to submit himself to whatever even yet remained to be done. Faith within, and water without, were ready (were here.) To be baptized. Therefore he had heard from Philip as to baptism."

Acts x. 47.—"Water. He uses the term water for baptism by tapeinosis, (less expressed than is implied.) When the greater thing has been given, that which is less is added by the giver, and is not despised by the receiver. He does not say, They now already have the Spirit; therefore, they can do without the water. They are not circumcised, and yet they are baptized. Therefore the footing on which baptism stands is much higher; compare chap. xv. 8, 9, which passage shews they were not to be circumcised; and yet Peter considered they ought to be baptized."

Acts x. 48.—"He commanded. He did not baptize with his own hands; there were others present to whom that office could be becomingly delegated; ver. 45. Compare 1 Cor. i. 17. (Ver. 15, 'Lest any should say, I baptized in my own name.')

Acts xxii. 16.—"Why tarriest thou? Quickly, saith he; strive to pass from a state of grief to a state of peace. Wash away: receiving baptism."

Rom. vi. 3.—"Into his death. He who is baptized puts on Christ, the second Adam; he is baptized, I say, into a whole Christ, and so also into his death; and it is the same thing as if, at that moment, Christ suffered, died, and was buried for such a man, and as if such a man suffered, died, and was buried with Christ." Verse 4, "We were buried with him. The fruits of the burial of Christ. Immersion in baptism, or at least the sprinkling of water upon the person,* represents burial—burial is a confirmation of death."

Gal. iii. 27.—"Ye have put on Christ. Christ is to you the toga virilis. [Note: Among the Romans, when a youth arrived at manhood, he assumed the dress of a full-grown man, which was called toga virilis.] You are no longer estimated by what you were—you are all alike in Christ and of Christ: see the following verses. Christ is the Son of God, and ye are in Him the sons of God. Tho. Gataker says, 'If a person were to ask you to define a Christian, I would give him no definition more rea-

Eph. v. 26.—"Might sanctify. Sanctification is derived from the death or blood of Christ; compare Heb. xiii. 12: cleansing, or purification, as we shall see presently, from baptism and the word. * * * And the mentioning of the bath [λουρῶν, washing]* and the word is urged conjointly, although the word is to be referred to the term cleansing. The cleansing power is in the word, and it is put forth through the bath [washing.] Water and the bath are the vehicle: but the word is a nobler instrumental cause. By the washing with water [lit. the bath of water] by the word. A remarkable testimony for baptism; Tit. iii. 5, in [by] the word. Baptism has the power of purifying owing to the word, John xv. iii."

Col. ii. 11.—"The putting off of the body—a mild definition of death. It is different therefore from baptism: it is the circumcision of the heart; it is death spiritual, in a good sense, whereas baptism is compared to burial." Verse 12. "In baptism. As death is before the resurrection, so in this third or middle term of the comparison, baptism naturally precedes mature (full-grown, faith."

Titus iii. 5.—"The washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost. Two things are mentioned: the washing of regeneration, which is a periphrasis for baptism into Christ; and the renewing of the Holy Spirit. * * * This regeneration and renewing takes away all the death and the old state, under which we so wretchedly lay, and which is described ver. 3: 2 Cor. v. 17."

Heb. x. 32.—"Being enlightened, i.e. immediately after φωτισμον,† i.e. Christigu baptism, ch. vi. 4. In baptism, Christ is put on: Christ is the light, therefore the light is put on in baptism. Enlightening denotes that further accession to the force and power of the Spirit, pre-existing for us from the Old Testament, which is gained from the vigour of the New, in the case of those who were baptized. This was the first entrance into Christianity: baptism was the means of salvation in the case of those who were properly fitted for it.* I am of opinion, that these divine ordinances, even in theory, are not so highly esteemed as they ought to be. In the very baptism of Christ, His holy human nature was magnificently enlightened. He was previously the Son of God; and yet the power of the Divine testimony to His Sonship, at His baptism, long affected Him in a lively manner. But as man consists of body and soul, so divine ordinances have this double relation. We must therefore make no separation, [between the ordinances and the grace] nor [on the other hand] is the glass to be taken for the liquor it contains, nor should the sheath be grasped instead of the sword."

1 Peter iii. 21. — "Ὁ καὶ ἡμᾶς ἀντί-τυπον. The relative ο, which, stands in the place of ὕδωρ, water; and has ἀντίτυπον added to it as an epithet; but the substantives, baptism and asking, ["answer"] are put in opposition to it. — νῦν, now: at this time, which is in other respects an evil time. — σῶσει, saves, brings us forth from the destruction of the whole world, and of the Jewish people. There is a reference to were saved, ver. 20. Peter shews that, as in former times there were some who perished through unbelief, and others who were saved through faith, so altogether in the New Testament there are some who are saved (as in this passage); others, on the contrary, who perish, ch. iv. 4-6: that they both experience, though in different ways, the efficacy (power) of Christ; which very thing has special force to bring forth the godly from the wicked, and to confirm them in patience. — οὐ σαρκὸς, not of the flesh. He declares why and how far baptism has so salutary an effect. There were baptisms also among the Jews; but they were such only as purified the flesh, and to this their efficacy was limited: even now the flesh is washed in baptism, but the washing of the flesh is not that in which baptism really consists, nor does it (baptism) save, so far as it is [i.e. in respect of its being] done by the hand: compare Eph. ii. 11; but so far as it is the asking ["answer"] of a good conscience. The word σαρκος, of the flesh, is emphatically put first, and the putting away of impurity is ascribed to the flesh [i.e. "the flesh's put*ting away of impurity.*"] (Accordingly, it is not said, the putting away of the filth of the flesh [as Eng. Vers.]); and the conscience is opposed to the flesh. συνειδήσεως ἀγαθῆς ἐπερώτημα, the asking of a good conscience, Dan. iv. 17. SH'ELTA* (parallel to which is PITHGAMA, a judicial decree, Heb. DABAR) in the Septuagint in this one passage. But SHAAL and DARASH† are often rendered by the same word, ἐπερωτῶ. The Greek Scholia have this: ἐπερώτημα, τούριστι, ἀπαθῶν, ἐνέχυρον, ἀποδείξις, an earnest, a pledge, a proof. There is no doubt that the Apostle has reference to the Hebrew SH'ELAH.‡ It is the part of the godly to ask, to consult, to address God with confidence; but it is the part of the ungodly not to ask him, or to ask idols: Judges xx. 18, 23, 27; 1 Saml. x. 22, xxiii. 2, 4; Isa. xxx. 2; Hosea iv. 12; in all which places the Septuagint has ἐπερωτᾶν. Therefore it is the asking of a good conscience which saves us; that is, the asking in which we address God with a good conscience, our sins being forgiven and laid aside. Compare ver. 18; Heb. x. 22. This asking is given in baptism; and it is exercised in all acts of faith, of prayers, and of Christian life; and God always regards it as worthy of an answer. Compare Deut. xxvi. 17, 18.—δι' ἀναστασεως, by the resurrection: constructed with saves. Comp. ch. i. 3, 21."||

‡ SH'ELAH, request, petition, prayer.—J. B. R.

|| There is much that is good and suggestive, along with something confused, in these notes on 1 Pet. iii. 21. Bengel is clearly in favor of translating eperoteema, "asking." This is a great advance. But he appears to interpret the words, "of a good conscience," as that which asks. How much more simple and obvious, to regard "of a good conscience," as the genitive of object denoting that which is asked. In this latter way two good points are gained; (1) harmony is preserved with the negative member of the parenthesis, since the words "of the filth of the flesh" are manifestly the genitive of object, i.e. "the filth of the flesh" does not "put away," but is put away; so a good conscience does not ask, but is asked. (2) By thus regarding a good conscience as asked, and, since God always regards it (this asking) as worthy of an

John v. 6. — "By water and blood. The water signifies baptism, which John first administered; hence called the Baptist, and sent to baptize in water for this reason, that Jesus might be manifested as the Son of God. John i. 33, 34. Moreover baptism was also administered by the disciples of Jesus: John iv. 1, 2; Acts ii. 38, &c. The blood is certainly the blood of one, and that Jesus Christ, which was shed at his passion, and is drunk in the Lord's Supper.—Jesus the Christ. Jesus, who came by water and blood, is by this very fact pointed out as the Christ. * * But in water and blood. He not only undertook, when he came to baptism, the task of fulfilling all righteousness, answer" received in baptism, it is readily perceived how the Apostle, by his parenthesis, guards, illustrates, confirms, (not explains away) his major proposition, baptism now saves us, through the resurrection of Jesus Christ. How does it save? Peter replies, "Because the essence of the ordinance is—not the putting away of the filth of the flesh (though 'even now the flesh is washed in baptism,' i.e. immersion) but—the asking of a good conscience toward God." Jesus' resurrection secures to such an asking an answer, and the answer is, salvation! Had Bengel said, "Therefore it is the asking of a good conscience which saves us; that is, the asking in which we (coming to baptism) address God for a good conscience, that our sins may be forgiven and laid aside," he would, I submit, have expounded more clearly and scripturally. Once more: instead of regarding antitypon as an epithet added to the relative "which [water]," is it not far simpler to consider it as an epithet added to the pronoun us? Winer (N. T. Gram. p. 550) so construes it. The order of the words favors it. The sense gains by it. They, saved by water, were a type of us; we, saved by baptism, are an antitype of them. Might not the entire passage be accurately rendered thus:—"Into which few, that is eight, souls were completely saved through water; which now saves us also, as an antitype, even immersion (not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the asking of a good conscience toward God) through the resurrection of Jesus Christ?"—J. B. R.

Mat. iii. 15, but He also completed it by pouring out His blood, John xix. 30; and when this was done, blood and water came forth from the side of Jesus Christ, being dead on the cross. The same chapter, ver. 34."

We have omitted from the above the following, which we present with brief comments.

Mat. xxviii. 19. — "Discipulize—baptizing. The verb μαθητεύειν signifies, to make disciples; it includes baptism and teaching; comp. John iv. 1 with the present passage."

This note is slightly ambiguous. If Bengel means to say, that the process of making disciples is accurately gone through by, 1st baptizing, and 2nd teaching, then we decidedly dissent. Had he said, "The work of discipulizing, while discharged mainly by, 1st, preaching the Gospel, (Mark xvi. 16. at the same time includes, 2nd, baptism, and 3rd, teaching," he would have commanded my unqualified assent.

In the same place Bengel broaches an idea which he thus repeats on Acts ii. 38. — "In the name of Jesus * The Jews, as being already in covenant with God (the Father) by circumcision, were to be baptized in the name (ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι) of Christ, and to receive the gift of the Holy Spirit; the Gentiles, as being wholly aliens from God, were, according to Mat. xxviii. 19, to be baptized into the name (εἰς τὸ ὄνομα) of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost."

But the questions arise: Can an interpretation of the "nations" in Mat. xxviii. which excludes the Jews be sustained, in the light of Luke xxiv. 47? Did circumcision introduce the Jews into the new covenant with God (the Father)? And—Did not the Jews, according to Bengel's own shewing, require to be baptized into the name of the Son and of the Spirit? Where finds he provision for that? This distinction, then, we cannot but regard as being fanciful. J. B. R.

EXHORTATION.

WE commend the following Essay to the especial notice of some of our readers. It was published some twenty-seven years ago, by one who is now a father among the true Israel of God. and mighty in the Scriptures.—Ed.

WHAT do we mean by the word exhortation? Much depends in this instance, as, indeed, in all others, on affixing Scriptural ideas to Scriptural words. The current acceptance of this term must, like all others, be ascertained from an examination of all the passages where it is found. From a careful examination of these it will appear, that in the primitive age, the term preaching, in its full import, comprehended testifying and exhorting. Acts ii. 40, "With many other words did Peter testify and exhort, saying, Save yourselves from this perverse generation." To testify, is to adduce testimony or evidence in proof of the proposition; to exhort is to persuade, beseech, or excite persons to act in accordance with the truth, or fact, stated in the proposition. Teaching implied also the explanation, elucidation, and development of the meaning of a fact, a term, a parable, or a prophecy, and is also connected with exhortation. Hence preachers and teachers are occasionally in the practice of exhortation.

But that which is appropriately called exhortation, must be distinguished from teaching and preaching as a distinct and separate work. "He who exhorts," says Paul, "let him exhort." The exhortations which the Apostles delivered were to excite to obedience. They consisted of arguments, expostulations, and motives, addressed to the understanding, will, and affections, to move them in accordance with the gospel.

To prophecy was to speak by inspiration—to edify Christians by new oracles, or the exposition and application of those formerly delivered. It does not appear that prophesying and exhorting were the same work. Paul did not use them as synonymous. He contradistinguishes prophesying from exhortation (Rom. xii. 7, 8.) That the prophets and the prophesying mentioned in 1 Cor. xiv. were the same as exhorters and exhortation, does not appear so evident as to authorize the application of Paul's discourse to the Corinthians to the ordinary work of exhortation. The Prophets mentioned in the 12th, 13th, and 14th chapters of 1st Corinthians, were men possessed of spiritual gifts; and by the use of these gifts they edified, exhorted, and comforted the brethren; yet exhortation and prophesying are not the same thing, any more than the gift of tongue convincing of unbelievers. All are not prophets that word; but all men can exhort others. A were allowed to speak, but they were to "for the spirits of the subject to the prophets

While, then, we agree that Christians in at proper times, and it may exhort one another authorized to apply the Prophets of Corinth wish to exhort their brethren in assemblies. Those who Prophets were "spirit men possessed of spirit all the brethren in apostles, prophets, or ex

That prophesying mean explanation of Scripture conceded without imply may expound Scripture the sense of Paul's discourses. All men are animals are not men. All Scripture, but all exhortation are not prophets. exhort, and may be called one sense, but all exhortation. We cannot, premises before us, apply to the Prophets in Corinth members of any congregation all in any congregation it their duty to exhort.

Exhortation was a part of the cation of the Jews in worship; and after the Sacred Writings the synagogue gave either a special invitation to those they had any word of say it." Under this invitation and the Apostles synagogues (Luke iv. As exhortations were practiced either on the portions of or on some others read stood up, calling upon them to obey the divine precept always short and pertinent record could have occupied ten minutes.

We have witnessed many abuses of this privilege. Indeed we have found not a few instances where the time of a congregation was wasted in listening to the most irrelevant and unedifying harangues, called exhortations. The brethren thought it was the duty of all to say something; and they spoke like those who were discharging a duty which must be done as necessary to complete the ancient order of things. When a person rises to speak for the sake of speaking, he can seldom edify a congregation. But it is not the duty of any one to speak who has not something to say worth hearing. All cannot be teachers, speakers, or exhorters; there must be some to listen and learn. No one is commanded to speak who cannot edify; for edification is the object. Nobody is all eye, ear, or tongue. "There are many members in one body, but all members have not the same office." All are not exhorters, all are not prophets, all are not apostles.

Experience will soon decide who can speak to edification and comfort. And it is the duty of those who preside to see that this privilege is not abused. If not used it cannot be abused. The principal abuses which we have noticed are the following:—

Doctrinal debates have been introduced under the plea of exhorting one another. A brother rises to give his views of some passage of Scripture. Another supposes he has not got the true meaning of it, and then gives his exposition; the first replies, a third shows his opinion, and in the evening the president decides who was right. Thus the church merges into a debating school.

Denunciations against heretics. A brother rises and bewails the divisions found in Christendom—accuses the Pope, the Episcopalians, Presbyterians, and Methodists; denounces the clergy and the creeds, and refutes the errors of Cerinthus, the Gnostics, or John Calvin. The church listens, and is as much edified as if she heard the wars of the Jews, or the adventures of Telemachus.

Sermons to the unconverted. A brother thinks he ought to exhort sinners to repentance; and instead of edifying the church, addresses Deists, Sceptics, and all the non-professors, some of whom are not, perhaps, present. This is wholly out of order. It is brethren who are to be exhorted, if the Apostles' doctrine of exhortation is to be our guide. No allusion to spectators is allowable, or in order, when any one exhorts the brethren. Besides, such allusions leads the auditors to suppose that the exhortations are more intended for effect with them than for the benefit of the church.

Disquisitions upon words and phrases. This is the work of a commentator, critic, or translator, rather than an exhorter. Such disquisitions and criticisms are not often called for, even in the labours of those whose business it is to comment on Scripture, much less are they necessary in exhorting men to piety and humanity. Verbal criticisms and disquisitions upon language, unless from literary men, are always disgusting, and injurious to the reputation for good sense of him who indulges in them.

To call debates on the meaning of the Scriptures, denunciations against heresy, sermons to unconverted men, and verbal criticisms and disquisitions, exhortations, to Christians is a gross abuse of language. To persuade and induce the brotherhood to love one another, to keep all the commandments of the Saviour, and to follow peace with all men, and holiness, (without which no man shall see the Lord) is the great object of Christian exhortation.

One or two exhortations, if short and pathetic, after the reading of the Holy Oracles and the observance of the ordinances of the church, will generally be both acceptable and useful to the brethren; but the making of exhortation, in its too common acceptation, the business of the day, and inducing every one to take part in it as a necessary duty, appears to us the opposite extreme to having one man licensed to preach, and every other man silenced by law. The reading of the Holy Scriptures, prayer by the brethren, praise and the other acts of worship, in the absence of those who are qualified to edify the church, will be more profitable to the brethren and less injurious to the world, than such abuses of the privilege of exhortation as those before specified. "Let all things be done decently and in order."

ANNIVERSARY OF THE AMERICAN BIBLE U THE PRESENT CONDITION OF THE REVISION

THE condition and prospects of the Revision, naturally awaken solicitude at such a time. The Committee on Versions have met frequently during the past season. Their conferences have been patient, and their deliberations have all referred to the one great object so dear to every member of the Union, and to the measures required to hasten the work. Members of the Final Committee have been consulted. Between them and the officers of the Union there have been almost daily interviews, and this question is a mutual one with us : "Can we do anything more than we are doing to urge our great work forward, more rapidly, to its completion?"

Our chief anxiety now, is the apparently slow progress of the Revision. We expected to have Matthew (from Dr. Conant's hands) complete and widely circulated ere this. The Appendix to this Gospel has delayed it. Dr. Conant is working hard—very hard—day and night, that it may come forth in such perfection as will leave little to be done after him; and such as will give to our friends the fullest possible evidence of the thoroughness with which the revision is prosecuted.

The Appendix to Matthew, designed to accompany it in its first issue, is really an Appendix to the entire New Testament. No other of the kind will ever be needed. In this Appendix Dr. Conant classifies every case of the use of the Greek word baptizo, not merely where it occurs in the original sacred writings, but also in the writings of Greek authors, so far as they have come down to us. For more than a quarter of a century, he has been collating the examples, as his reading and teaching led him to discover instances of the use of this word. The authors whose testimony is analyzed in this Appendix lived, some of them from 200 to 300 years before Christ, others in the apostolic age, and others still along, down to the close of Greek literature. Dr. Conant is thus enabled to determine its use and meaning beyond a doubt or a peradventure.

This Appendix is designed especially for the millions who read the English language. Every example is fully translated into English. They may wish to test the quotations and translations at the foot of each page of the and page, and the language the original. So, while the means of criticism reader has the whole in own language. We have of the reviser, that the Matthew, may be confident to be ready for circulation by the first day of Galatians, by Dr. H. mised by September first arranged to print it with

Mark is so far advanced to issue it in a few months is published, with the ment of the Final Committee

The First Epistle to pared for critical examination sued in the June and July the Monthly Reporter.

The Second Epistle to appear during the present be followed immediately the pastoral Letters.

In its eagerness to advance work, the Board has late obligations beyond its means relying upon the co-operation of friends, and the sacred unpaid membership of those seemed to be already engaged was possible, when we have engage the whole of Dr. time, and to compensate lucrative engagements induced to relinquish forcept the few hours a week him for his ordinary University Besides this, the Board, acting, in July, authorized the on Versions to make arrangements another Hebrew scholar, American universities, to ing forward the work of sion more rapidly. The felt by the Board was the increase of expense. The ments will add £460 per previous liabilities. Yet, liberation, the necessity to all, and the authority ment of this accurate sch mously given. The Committee now have the matter in hand. Shall they go forward and perfect the arrangement? It needs but the hearty sympathy and prompt aid of our long tried friends to meet these burdens, and secure by them an immense advantage to the Bible Union.

We wish to hasten the Revision, and at the same time to make it as thorough as possible; and we cannot resist the conviction that the Lord, who has guided us hitherto, directs us in these new openings to go forward. In the case of one of the scholars now at our command, we felt that a refusal on our part would have been a refusal to improve a providential blessing. Its improvement would be a lasting benefit.

But our resources need to be immediately increased. Our treasury has been constantly overdrawn through the Summer months, and is now overdrawn nearly £200. It will require but little aid from each of our numerous friends to make up this want, and keep all the wheels in motion. Our revisers must have their daily bread. Our printers cannot work without money. Our binders come every month for their compensation. Book publishers who have, by their agents, procured works from every corner of Europe to aid us, must be paid; and there is now due, for a recent very rare collection, about £120.

We now seem almost to be sweeping within the gates, to the possession of the great boon so long and so anxiously anticipated. Never before were we so near to the acquisition, in our own language, of a purer transcript of the Sacred Oracles. Help us, brethren, in this hour of hope! Help us in this toil! Help us now! For now we do greatly need your help. If only half the aid which each one is easily able to render were sent to us, our hearts would be lightened, and every department of the enterprise will advance with increased rapidity.

"THE BLIND IS DOWN."

So said a little girl whose father was speaking to her about the all-seeing eye of God. In the simplicity of her soul she thought, and to her earthly parent gave the utterance—"God cannot see me now, father, because the blind is down." The expression was simple, child-like, suggestive, and instructive. Children sometimes say very beautiful things. One who was asked about the greatness of God, said, "He is so large that the heaven of heavens cannot contain him, and he is so little that he can dwell in my heart." Another who was asked what the stars were, said, "They were little holes in the sky, to let God's glory through." But to revert to our heading. What darkness and blindness abound! There are many of the inhabitants of the world who act as though their understandings were darkened, and there appears to be no light in them. And of others it may be said, "If the light that is in them be darkness, how great is that darkness." Are there any who use the language of Eliphaz, in charging Job with saying—"How doth God know? Can he judge through the dark cloud? Thick clouds are a covering to him, that he seeth not?" How solemn is the thought, that the eye of God is constantly upon us! And though clouds and darkness are round about his throne, all the thoughts and affections of the children of men are exposed to his view. Such a simple thing as a window blind might conceal vice, and even murder, from the mind of man; but it is not so with Him of whom the poet has said,

"Almighty God! thy piercing eye
Strikes through the shades of night;
And our most secret actions lie
All open to thy sight."

God looketh upon the earth, and it trembleth; and he toucheth the hills, and they smoke; and in his presence they melt like wax. And before him the heavens are unclean.

We will now endeavor to notice a few of those characters who act as though they believed "the blind is down."

Are there no wolves in sheep's clothing? Look at that dangerous man with his two faces and his double tongue. What a miserable man! He is false to himself, and false to his friends. He smiles when he should frown, and frowns when he should smile. What a smooth tongue he has! How interesting, gentle, and kind he appears. What tricks he plays with others, and what a wreck he makes of himself. His professions are all based upon a false foundation. He is a man in a mask. When full of wicked designs, he appears the most loving. He strikes a bargain with evil, and calls it good. When he enters the house of the Lord, his mission appears to be, to deceive the very elect. He is a living death, and must often abhor himself. He has lost all self-respect; he knows what condemns him, and looking through the disturbed medium of his own selfishness and wickedness, he endeavors to believe that all men are as bad as himself. His character is a blot, his language a lie, his heart a sink-pool for the worst of vices, while his lips are tipped with the semblance of truth. Poor, wretched mortal of gilded corruption; he acts as though he thought the blind is down.

See Mr. Fair's speech: how bland and obliging he is; with what ease and gracefulness he makes his promises. His words are as sweet as honey, and as smooth as oil. From such an exterior, who would not think that all was fair within? Mark that man; he is empty, hollow, and treacherous. He has deceived many by his fair promises. He will agree with two opposite parties; his motto is, that when at Rome he must do as Rome does. He often flatters himself that he is pleasing everybody. His propositions or suggestions appear to be very just, and he often seems to be actuated only for the good of others. He modulates his tones; he believes in the winning power of soft and gentle words. Beware of him; he will speak kindly to your face, and stab you in the dark. Like the poor child, such a man acts as though he believed the blind is down.

We now speak to Mr. Make-excuse. "We did not see you at the lecture last evening." "Well, no," he exclaims, "I fully intended to be there, but a friend called upon me at the time, and I could not come." My friend, the blind is not down. We speak to Bro. A. or B. and tell him that we had a very interesting meeting on the Lord's day morning. We remark, too, upon the excellency of the addresses delivered, and how we felt our hearts to glow with unearthly fire while the Saviour's love and death were the themes of those who spoke. "Where were you, my brother?" And the answer may be, "I felt rather unwell, and could not attend." To many of such it might be said, "Do not forget the blind is not down." Brethren, we write in love and affection, and we conjure you not to let anything short of absolute necessity keep you from the church. Be always ready to prove your love to Zion's King, by meeting with those who break the bread in memory of the body, and who drink of the fruit of the vine in memory of his blood. In the name of the Man of Calvary, let us have no excuses. We must all give an account. There is nothing which can hide us from the glance of God. It is impossible for the blind to be down.

"Yes, dear," exclaims Miss Talkative, who is speaking to a younger friend, "we are going to Mr. A.'s to drink tea. It will be so pleasant; they are very nice people indeed. But let me caution you a little. As I have said, they are nice people, but you must be very particular what you say before Mrs. A. for she is very much disposed to talk to others; so unless you are very careful what you say, you will very likely hear of it again. I only give you a word of caution, and be sure and do not say a word to her daughter. I hear she is rather clever, but I think she is very dangerous; so be careful, that's a dear." "I think," exclaims the uninitiated, "I would rather not go." "Oh, nonsense," exclaims Miss Talkative, "go, by all means, and you may depend upon it we shall enjoy ourselves." They desire and meet with a hearty welcome, an excellent repast is provided, and every effort is made to please and make them comfortable. But soon the work of detraction commences. Miss Talkative has quite forgotten all the rules of social propriety, and making herself by far the most conspicuous of the company, she feels perfectly free, in rather a loud tone, to express her judgment upon the talents and deficiencies of absent friends. Mrs. B. is disposed of quickly, as one of the proudest of her sex. Mrs. C. is cold, lifeless, and has no mind of her own. Mr. D. is a dandy, and Mrs. E. is a doll. Mr. F. is a brutish man, and ought not to be tolerated. Miss G. is all affectation, and her parents are as bad; "in fact," exclaims Miss Talkative, "they have spoilt their child." Here the generous hostess kindly asks Miss Talkative, "Have I not seen you with them all ; and have they not treated you as a friend ; and would they not now ? I cannot but express my regret that you should have spoken of them in such an objectionable manner, and I think it would be more profitable to all present if some other subject were to form the topic of our conversation, for I must, even at the expense of being considered rude, affirm that I have found all the parties named to be very different from the opinions which have been expressed." Miss Talkative is somewhat perplexed. In many respects there is much in her character to admire, but this is her failing, and she belongs to that class who act as though the blind is down.

When we hear extravagant descriptions, everything is magnified. "I never saw it rain so hard before," exclaims one. "Oh ! the flakes of snow were as large as your hand." "This is the hottest day I ever knew," or, "this is the coldest." By such persons scarcely anything is referred to as it is. Twenty will be spoken of as forty, and an insignificant part as the half, or the whole. Defects in character are magnified, or, as the prejudice may bias, virtues are too highly extolled. From such parties it is next to impossible to get at the real truth. Let us not forget that the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, must be spoken, and that for every word we shall have to give an account.

"Yes ! yes ! you may depend upon it it is true," exclaims Mr. Talebearer, "I have heard it more than once ; you may depend upon it that it was said, and he will get himself into trouble for having said it. How shameful it is," continues this Mr. Talebearer, "to speak against persons in their absence ; he ought to have known better. I am told it in confidence, that he has been speaking evil of Mr. K. and of Mr. L. but be sure and do not say a word about it. I suppose it will be revealed in time, and then what a hubbub there will be ; but do not mention it to any one that you have heard a word from me, for I do not intend to have anything to do with it." Ah ! Mr. Talebearer, you are a miserable and very dangerous man—you have already done much mischief—you have not only said what you have heard, but you have tinged it with your foolish and wicked suspicions. Are there no talebearers who act as though the blind was down ? Be careful, for the weal or woe of thy brother or thy sister may be in thy hands ; and never forget, that in offending one of the little ones you may offend Jesus. How quietly Mr. Talebearer sits ; his ears are wide open, and he drinks the whole draughts of slander, and to some statements which may have no foundation in truth, he exclaims, "Impossible ; is it really so ? It is worse than one could have expected. You surprise me, Mr. B." He (the talebearer) then utters a depreciating hint or two, which serve as pegs, upon which Mr. B. makes a few other remarks, and the poor talebearer treasures up all these falsehoods until his soul is full. He is heavily laden with misrepresentations and slander. Against his own wish or will he feeds upon deception. He has admitted a demon into his soul, and his spirit is burdened with all manner of abomination. Both are wrong—the talebearer and the talehearer. They have acted a disgraceful part—they have both deprived themselves of righteous judgment—they have estranged themselves from their best friends—they have been mutually at work in the dark, stabbing those who had neither the means of defence nor of explanation—they have acted as though they thought the blind was down. Surely it did not strike them that they were committing a grievous sin beneath the direct and piercing eye of God.

Young men, beloved in the Lord, beware ! This is a sinful world. The spirit of evil is abroad in the earth—temptations strong and powerful may present themselves. Pleasure, with her bland smile, may try to fascinate you from the path of virtue. Riches may allure. The world, the flesh, and the Devil may combine to involve you in ruin. Beware ! The gin palace is a licensed man-trap—the theatre may throw open its doors—the ball-room may glare with its attractive light—bewitching music may lead you astray, and false and fallen women may strive to lead you down to the chamber of death, and to the gates of hell. Should any, or all these temptations beset your pathway, do not act as though you believed the blind is down ; but remember the words, "Thou, God, seest me." Shun the evil and escape for your life. I have heard of a father who was stealing corn ; but before he did so he looked all around, and seeing no one, he thought the way was clear ; his little boy, however, reminded him that he had not looked up ; he did so, and thought "Thou, God, seest me," and he went home a wiser and a better man. When he looked up he felt that the blind was not down.

Some time ago, a father told his little boy to carry a parcel, and leave it at a house on his way to the Sabbath school. To which the boy replied : "Father, I cannot on this day." "Oh ! never mind," exclaimed the father, "put it in your pocket, nobody will see it." To which the lad replied : "Aye, but father, God can see into my pocket." How full of teaching are these simple and truthful sayings !

The spirit of selfishness often leads to habits and phrases which invariably bring leanness into the soul. There are some very rich persons who are almost always pleading poverty. Ask them to give to a good and commendable object, and they will tell you they cannot afford it. They never recognize that divine truth, that "He who giveth to the poor, lendeth to the Lord." We do not mean to charge those persons who, when they speak of their poverty without being poor, of telling falsehoods with an intention to injure ; but we have heard quite enough of such conversations to feel ourselves justified in condemning them. Selfishness often prompts to falsehood—it dries up the generous feelings of the soul. The spirit of benevolence dies. A strange disposition to obtain money is excited, and there are many who speak about their estate as though God heard them not. What they say is not said in the light of the judgment-day. Such persons belong to those who act as though, with the simple child, they believed the blind was drawn.

In the infinite wisdom of His eternal purpose, God hath wisely and lovingly concealed many things from us ; but it is impossible for us to conceal anything from Him. He is light, and in him is no darkness. Though clouds and darkness are round about His throne, they hide us not from the glance of His eye. Betwixt His Spirit and our spirits nothing can intervene, and we can only worship Him aright by doing so in spirit and in truth. The inspired writer said : "Whither shall I go from thy Spirit ? Or, whither shall I flee from thy presence ? If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there : if I make my bed in hell, behold thou art there. If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea ; even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me. If I say, surely the darkness shall cover me ; even the night shall be light about me : yea, the darkness hideth not from thee, but the night shineth as the day. The darkness and the light are both alike to thee." What a mercy it is that God can see us, and that he knows us altogether. Does not this conviction make the sinner stand in awe, while the humble believer feels self-condemned ? With a cherished sin there can be no secret prayer. The soul which persists in a course of wrong doing, may deceive both the church and the world ; but it can enjoy no real communion with God. Sin throws its gloomy shadows over all the prospects of the soul, and that spirit which might have been beautiful for the habitation of the Holy One, becomes a desolation and dreary home for serpents, and adders, and unclean birds, Thanks be unto God for His unspeakable gift. We are children of the kingdom, and heirs of immortal glory. Through Jesus we are living and hoping for pleasures which are eternal, and for joys which shall never pass away.

OPEN COUNCIL

AMERICAN CLERICALISM.

From this inland town of our mighty land, I send you a few words on a subject which has been weighing on my mind. Being quite alone here, I have always looked for the arrival of the Harbinger with joy, because it reports the progress of the truth of God. Unable to assist this great work, it has been constantly on my heart, and I have rejoiced as I read of the increasing power of the British churches. But America has, I confess, been the place to which my thoughts have chiefly turned, with fixed feelings of fear and hope. Fear, because I dreaded lest the rapid progress and great prosperity of our churches there, should produce the same sad results so often witnessed in the history of reformation; hope, because I trusted that the faithful teachings of men who were not hirelings, and therefore free to rebuke and exhort according to the Scriptures, would restrain evil tendencies, and preserve the church as pure as we can hope for in this dark world. It was, then, with great pain that I read Bro. Butler's letters, especially his last in reply to Bro. Coles.

Bro. B. evidently feels that he has no scriptural arguments on his side, and therefore very prudently avoids argument altogether. Yet not quite. In the beginning of his letter he has one hence. What does it connect? "The Scriptures are silent about locating and sustaining a brother to preach; hence this practice is not condemned." Hence also every other ecclesiastical absurdity not mentioned in Scripture is not condemned. I will not, however, trouble you with any remarks intended to refute the statements of the letter, but will, if you permit, shew cause why the system of paid pastors is, and must be, highly injurious.

Young men chosen for this office are sent to a college to be trained in certain branches of learning. The majority of these never become either learned men or deep thinkers. They are put into a position which, if it is to exist at all, requires both originality and extensive learning, and they feel that they have to assume what they do not possess. Hence clerical presumption, error, and bigotry. They are often inferior to members of the churches over which they preside in solidity of judgment and depth of piety, and yet they are the fountain of all teaching and exhortation. Separated from the usual duties of life, they are ignorant of its temptations, cares, and sorrows, and are therefore unfit to warn and comfort. Who has not felt, that the monitory voice, or the cheering encouragement of a MAN who has passed through the weary struggle of daily life, is worth a thousand made-up discourses on promises or threatenings, by a newly-fledged graduate, whose life has been spent among Arcadian bowers, Greek politics, or Roman victories? Far be it from me to despise true learning, or to undervalue the advantages resulting from an intimate acquaintance with the wondrous productions of the great of old, but I cannot admit that such knowledge can ever supply the lack of deep, personal acquaintance with God, as revealed in Christ, and that heartfelt reliance on his faithfulness, love, and power, which are only learnt amidst the pruning cares and vicissitudes of life's pilgrimage. While, therefore, learning is esteemed valuable, let it be put in the same rank in the qualifications of Christian pastors in which Paul put it.

Again, the support of the paid pastor will chiefly fall on some of the wealthy members. Do we not all well know the consequences? Is the wealthy Mr. B. a spirit merchant? The parson drinks wine, and looks coldly on abstinents. Does Mrs. B. dress extravagantly, and lead others astray? The pulpit is dumb, and certain chapters are carefully avoided, lest they should offend pride and vanity. But it would be waste of time to shew examples of truckling to the faults of those on whom pay principally depends, since from the very nature of the present state of affairs it will happen. Now what an awful picture does this present. With what favor can God look on such a man or such a church? Will not their prayers be mockeries, and their efforts unblessed?

Have we not held and taught as a people, that the popular preacher's exquisite rhetoric, and the beautiful harmony of the practiced choir, and the elegant adornments, interior and exterior, of the highly finished chapel, are often in the sight of Heaven as the loathsome development of human vanity and sin? When, then, I read one of ourselves speaking of building "attractive houses for the habitation of God," my soul sinks within me. Brethren of America, has it come to this? Have ye yet filled your poor with bread, and covered the earth with missionaries, that you hear the world's Saviour and Lover order such investments as these? Shall it be said of you, too, that you thought God dwelt in temples of stone, while you have forgotten, nay, refused to seek for Him the living temples of redeemed, purified, and loving human hearts? Have you shown your reverence for Messiah, when, after thirty years of great success, you have hardly carried His name beyond your own land? If this cold state is to be perpetuated, the paid pastor system will do it effectually. But will no woe be visited upon those who refuse obedience to the Great Lord's last solemn command? The woes, agonies, and groans of a perishing world are ascending to Heaven, and are heard by Him whose eyes search all hearts, and who knows those who sigh and weep for the destruction of man.

It is with deep pain that I pen these lines, but the letter of Bro. Butler has troubled me greatly. Have our brethren in America forgotten the Great Laborer's address to the Ephesian elders, and the 12th and 14th chapters of 1 Cor.?

procured the Lord's death, because he would take away their position, to this age, wherever this dangerous class distinction has obtained, they have been faithful to the instincts of their profession. Exceptions there are, of course; but Protestant or Papist, Episcopalian or Wesleyan, Baptist or Pædobaptist, this has been the rule. Shall we, against Scripture, reason, and the experience of ages, create such an order of our own will? Shall we exchange the simple, but weighty instruction of the experienced Christian, for the elaborated essay of the popular preacher? Shall we, too, say that the Statute Book of the Kingdom of Heaven is silent on a matter of the deepest practical moment, and leaves it to this ignorance and folly of man? Such a doctrine is very unpopular in certain schools. I thought we had escaped it.

Deeply convinced that the directions of the Holy Spirit, emanating from infinite love and wisdom, are fully suited to the wants of the church, and are given to preserve her from the dangers to which she is exposed, I would solemnly urge on our American brethren the fearful responsibility they are incurring, by altering the ancient laws, and appointing themselves a legislative council in the Kingdom of God. Before I heard of them I had learned from the Book of God, that the one-man system was opposed to its plain directions and its spirit. I was delighted when I found kindred minds, and yet more delighted with the information I obtained from their works—especially those of Bro. Campbell. I cannot believe that he approves of these things, and would hear his opinions with great respect. But if clericalism is to reign amongst us, I feel that the Reformation is at an end, and that the earnest well-wishers for man must again hang down their heads in the bitterness of disappointment.

THE KINGDOM OF GOD.

IN the B. M. Harbinger for October last I read an answer of D. K. to E. E. Swansea, shewing when the Kingdom of God commenced, which, according to his judgment, was at the day of Pentecost. If it is not contrary to your practice, I should feel much indebted, if you would insert this question.

How are we to understand the Lord's teaching in Luke xxi. 25-30? He connects His coming as Son of Man in a cloud with power and great glory, with signs in the Sun, Moon, and stars—distress of nations, men's hearts failing for looking after those things which are coming upon the earth—for the powers of heaven shall be shaken, and then shall they see him come. Addressing His disciples, He continues—"When these things begin to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads, for your redemption (redemption from what?) draweth nigh." In the parable following, of the fig-tree, alluding, I judge, to the same period of time, He says—"So likewise ye, when ye see these things come to pass, know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand."

Did these signs, &c. precede the day of Pentecost? Did men see the Son of Man come in a cloud with power and great glory? Did the disciples thus know that the Kingdom of God was nigh at hand?

QUERY AND REPLY.

THE CHURCH: ITS COMMENCEMENT AND GOVERNMENT.

In continuing our notice of this subject, we can only reply in very general terms to the several communications which we have recently received. It is thought by some, that as John the Baptist came to prepare a people for the Lord, and as multitudes from Jerusalem, Judea, and the country round about, went out to be immersed by him in the Jordan, that he was very successful in thus preparing a large congregation who were ready to welcome the long-expected Messiah when he should appear in their midst. But what are the facts of the case? He came to his own land, and his own people (as a nation) did not receive him; but to as many as received him, believing in his name, he granted the privilege of being the children of God; who derive their birth, not from blood, nor from the desire of the flesh, nor from the will of man, but from the will of God.

John received his commission from heaven, and was sent to the Jews only, who, as a people, had made void the law of Moses by their traditions; and therefore, had sinned against God in a sense and manner which none of the then Gentile nations could possibly do. Now the commission of John was, to proclaim the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins. But this could not be Christian baptism, for it was not baptism into the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit; and, moreover, it was restricted to the Jews. Those who accepted the conditions were pardoned, and entered into a state of righteousness or justification. In every dispensation of mercy, the forgiveness of sin has invariably been realized through some act of obedience on the part of the believing penitent. The instances of forgiveness on the part of the Saviour personally, can scarcely be regarded as exceptions to this rule. And Jesus is still the Author of the present and the eternal salvation to those who obey him.

It would seem that only some few of John's disciples became followers of Jesus previous to his crucifixion, and these received him as the Son of God, and the Great Teacher whose advent they had so long expected. The question has been asked, whether any females were baptized by John? We cannot positively affirm that there were, though it is very probable, for we read that the number of those who faithfully adhered to the Lord, after his resurrection and ascension, were about one hundred and twenty, some of whom we are certain were women. And these were all assembled together on the day of Pentecost, and were filled with the Holy Spirit (Acts ii.) Here, then, we have the nucleus of our Lord's kingdom—the commencement of the body of Christ—the temple of the Holy Spirit, and the dwelling-place of the Most High—the church of the living God. This community was composed entirely of the seed of Abraham, for there was not a single Gentile among them. Now this was the appointed medium through which the truth was to flow to all the nations of the earth. This was the boundary from which the apostolic commission was to take effect—"Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature; he that believeth and is baptized, shall be saved." There were no persons, even in Jerusalem, (whether they might have been baptized by John or not) who could now be united to the body of Christ, without submitting to these conditions. This, then, was the commencement of the new creation. The truly obedient were "created anew in Christ Jesus." "If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature." Great additions were made to this small congregation on the day of Pentecost; and while all were pardoned and justified on entering the kingdom, and ample means provided for their instruction and government under Christ, yet they were remarkably prejudiced against many of the truths which Jesus had propounded. But the Holy Spirit was given to the Apostles, "to bring all things to their remembrance, whatsoever he had said, and to shew them things to come." "They were all gradually taught of God." Supernatural gifts and endowments were bestowed upon the Apostles, for the instruction and guidance, the comfort and perfection, of the disciples. What Jesus had declared, "The kingdom of God is within you," was fully demonstrated by the teaching of these inspired men. The legislation of Christ was for the heart and conscience, the understanding and will, the motives and affections. As human laws cannot do this, no legislation of man can be binding upon the church of God. "Make the tree good, and the fruit will be good also."

Extraordinary gifts were at first bestowed in order to establish and perfect the truth and institutions of Christ; and this work being accomplished, these miraculous powers were withdrawn, and the propagation of the Gospel entrusted for all time with those whose hearts have been touched by the truth of God's Word, and whose lives are devoted to His service. Hence we have men amongst us of very limited education, and of still less worldly influence, who have been led to understand and appreciate the facts, commands, and promises of the Bible, and who have been instrumental in raising up churches which are built upon the sure foundation of the Prophets and Apostles. Jesus, the Christ, being the chief corner stone. The government of these communities is vested in the Redeemer himself, and, whilst absent, His laws are embodied in Holy Writ, and printed in the hearts of His people. "He gave some apostles, some prophets, some evangelists, some pastors and teachers, for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ." We thus see the perfect character of the Christian system, and the provision which is made for its prosperity and perpetuity. The officers of the church are pastors or overseers, deacons, and evangelists, who, in the providence of God, through the influence of His truth, and the Spirit of the Great Head of the Church, are raised up, gifted and qualified for their respective positions. When these persons appear in the body, as faithful and intelligent laborers, tried men of the Lord, they should be thankfully recognized as overseers in the church of God. The Bible does not sanction the "one man system" which prevails so much in the present day. The Apostles ordained elders in every church; and the Holy Spirit, speaking through Peter to the strangers scattered through Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, says, "The elders who are among you I exhort, who am also an elder, and a witness of the sufferings of Christ: feed the flock of God which is with you, exercising the overseer's office not by constraint, but willingly; neither for the sake of sordid gain, but from good disposition" (1 Pet. v. 1-10.) ## REVIEWS, NOTES ON PASSING EVENTS, CORRESPONDENCE, &amp;c

LAST year, once and again, the section of the B. M. Harbinger, under our care, was devoted to the "Revival Movement" then in progress. Just at this time attention is called to a revival of another kind—shall we call it A Revival of Infidelity? To do so would be scarcely correct, for we do not believe that Infidelity itself is revived. Let us then rather speak of a revival of Infidel organization and advocacy. The Lord of the Infidels has raised up for them a few pastors after his own heart—bold and defiant men, who are making terrible fuss just now, so that lecturing and debating are looking up in their camp.

'Tis intended to devote a few pages now and then to this movement, that the readers may know its character and progress, and as some stirring things have been recently said and done, we shall do so this month. D. KING.

DEBATE IN LIVERPOOL

DURING the last month Mr. Bradlaugh (known as "Iconoclast") has been made to some extent to feel the power of truth by J. Rutherford, who, a few years back, did battle with Mr. Holyoake. The portion of Mr. Rutherford's opening speech which we can find room for, will repay for the time spent in reading it.

"The question that forms the subject of our discussion to-night is, 'Are the doctrines and precepts of Christianity, as taught in the New Testament, calculated to benefit humanity or not?' Christianity comes to win men's opinions, not to coerce, and it makes no appeal other than to the intellect and intuitions of the soul. This question can be proved by three kinds of evidence going to its adaptation to the wants of the soul—the external, going to the history of Christianity—the internal, going to its adaptations of its several parts to each other, and the experimental. The question under any of these aspects, is eminently practical and simple. As regards the internal evidence to those who have experienced the general influence of the religion of Jesus upon their hearts, it is like asking if the Sun's light and heat are calculated to benefit humanity; the religion of Christ is to such, their souls, moral sun. As to the external evidence which it affords, no honest independent student of history can fail to recognize the mighty influence which Christianity has exercised upon the human race; and he will be a rash man who asserts that that influence has been for evil. At the same time, considering the different forms that opinion assumes, one is curious to know what, in the opinion of a Secularist, is a benefit to humanity. This so, we had better see if we are agreed upon the test to be applied—the ell-wand with which we are to measure and ascertain this benefit. Is it, then, a benefit to have no consciousness of a divine and infinite intelligence? To be obliged to look on your fellow beings as so many bits of animated dust? To have no higher standard of morality than each man's sense of what is useful. To be freed from any sense of responsibility to the Creator and Ruler of all? To owe no other duty to society than that which law demands and caprice dictates? To be assured that there is no hell for the finally impenitent; no heaven for the spiritually renovated? To abrogate the marriage law, and allow people to herd together in some parallelogrammatic paradise like so many cattle? To rob them of a safe guide in life, and a sure hope in death? If these be the Secularists' ideas of benefiting humanity, then, sir, I certainly say that Christianity has no such benefits to confer. But if it be to give the loftiest conceptions of the character of God and the destiny of man; to stimulate to the noblest and most disinterested endeavours to benefit our fellows; to give liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison doors to those that are bound; to stimulate material development, and encourage intellectual effort; to not only aid art, science, and philosophy, but consecrate them to the noblest ends: to cement friendship, increase patriotism, pull down the partitions that separate men, and invite them into one great family; to console men amid the troubles of the present life, and to prepare them for another and higher; then, sir, I maintain that Christianity in its principles, mission, and hopes, is a benefit to humanity. I say that not only is Christianity calculated to do all this, but that it has done it. To deal with it apart from its more spiritual and moral efficacy, I say that national life, is the direct ratio of Christian life, and that where the latter is purest and strongest there you will find the greatest political vigour and progress. To prove this, if you map out the world in its relations to a pure Christianity, you will find that in exact proportion to its dissemination and existence will you discover pre-eminence in the varied departments of morale, science, social laws, intellectual life, and material and political advancement. So far for a general statement; let us reduce it to a particular application. Take a bird's eye view of Europe. Turkey is rapidly passing into a stage of decomposition, which its diplomatic and military doctors find it very difficult to arrest. Russia, with her vast territory and native serfs, labouring under the same deprivation—a false religion—has no, strictly speaking, national existence—has no literature. Austria, that heterogeneous and pie-bald empire, represents nothing at present but impending ruin; the only bright star in her dark mass being Hungary, whose Protestantism alone has secured her the exceptional position. In Italy the tree of liberty has at length taken root, being transplanted from the soil once watered by the blood of Albigenses and Waldenses. Luther's fatherland has at least enlarged the domain of thought, and presented, perhaps, the largest and most valuable accessions to the literature of the world; while the land of Zwinglius and Farel, amid the fastnesses of its "everlasting hills," still preserves the cradle and abiding place of freedom. And of England, our own England, "land of the brave and the free," which, with all her faults, I love—what shall I say? To what shall we attribute the position of our native land, first as she is among the nations of the earth? To what but to the unrestricted possession of that Book which Wickliffe opened, and for which Latimer and Ridley died; giving birth, as it did, to those eternal principles of truth, justice, wisdom, and freedom of which Milton sung, and for the permanent establishment of which Cromwell drew his sword? Sir, to these principles, indebted as we are for them to Christianity, shall we cling, as to the sheet anchor of our existence and moral well-being, until, perhaps, it suits the philanthropy of Mr Bradlaugh and his friends to supply us with better. I think, Sir, that Mr. Bradlaugh, in assuming the task of disaffecting us towards Christianity, has undertaken one that he will find a difficulty in accomplishing. I strongly suspect that it is beyond his power to persuade the people whose faith is bound in the Saviour, that that same faith is degrading, and unworthy the recognition of their reason; so long as there are thousands and myriads to testify and show that through its saving and exalting efficacy, they have been raised from a state of mental, moral, and social degradation, in vain will it be for him to establish isolating and dehumanising tendencies against Christianity, because Christian communities, and the natural depravity of man, resist its elevating influences. Christianity, must be adjudged on its own merits, not from the existence of evils, against which it is continually combatting, and which it was instituted to destroy. The crimes committed in her name Christianity is not responsible for; and though still limited in its operations, externally it is to be weighed by what it has done, and what it aims to do, and not by the slurs and scandals which those who nominally profess it bring upon it. And now having briefly reviewed the general principles and workings of Christianity, let us pass to a brief consideration of its doctrines and their peculiar bearing on our moral and spiritual welfare.

First, then, look at what it teaches us about God. "He is a Spirit, and those who worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth." I approach this part of the subject the more earnestly, because I really believe that a great number of Secularists do not know what Christianity is, that they do not study the New Testament; and I am confident that if they only gave their minds to the doctrines and precepts of Christianity, they would alter their opinions. I know a Secularist who was one while he had not read the Bible, but who, having read the Testament through, said that a book that contained such a code of precepts and morals could not but be divine. I have at present many young men, members of my congregation, who were Secularists, but who, not from debate and argument, but from the reading of the Testament, have been brought to a true knowledge of themselves and God. What an image of God does the Testament reveal to us! Every spot in the universe a sanctuary, and no shrine but a believing, loving heart! "God is a spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth." * * *

Third: We have even a higher aspect of our Great Father, as presented to us in the New Testament. "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him shall not perish, but have everlasting life." Here is the perfection of love exemplified. We have been asked what is the great central truth of Christianity? The passage I have quoted for you is the answer. But we are taunted with the dark side of Christianity. If it offers its beatitude it has its punishment. True, we cannot expect the Seraphim without the Demon. Look at the whole school of Christianity, and that instead of an existence ending here we are only preparing ourselves for one to come, to which the poor, and needy, and down-trodden may look with comfort and with hope: and the gift is to all. We have all a common Father. I hold that to be on the ocean without a rudder, a sail, or an oar, is nothing in comparison to the feeling that in a universe like this you have no Father. I ask you when in the presence of the great calamities of life, you have looked around for solace, and a stay, if this thought has not brought its own relief? Barker may speak of the calm that he experiences since he has got rid of all religious systems; but supposing that we believe he exists in this isolation, is it one to bring him comfort in the day of necessity and trial? Sir James Mackintosh, a man of very great grasp of intellect, was in his last dying hours led to feel this want. He called his daughter to his bed side, and asked her to read. She did so, reading the 14th chapter of John. The dying man clasped his hands and said, "I believe." "In God?" asked the daughter. "In Jesus" was the answer. To my mind it is a consciousness bringing the greater comfort that I have a great Father, who regards and cares for me; this feeling removes the idea of a God from an infinite abstraction, and brings you in contact with a personal friend. Let us examine the image of our God, as seen in the Saviour. Here we find the doctrine, precept, and example of Christianity, all presented. Here we have God looking through a human eye, and weeping over the woes of humanity, sharing their griefs. Here we find, for the first time too, that happiness is to be sought from the heart, and not from external means. Again, mark the way in which the great work was set on foot and advanced. Most of us depend upon extraneous means, and to triumph of the masses for the accomplishment of any great task, but mark the origin and progress of Christianity: from a small stream it became a mighty river, until it has fructified the whole earth. There are those who say they can find Christianity before Christ. Let them prove it. True it is, Christianity has become human systems, but this man has done to further his own ends; but for the effects, evils, and wrongs so produced he is answerable—not Christianity. Christ devoted himself to the redemption of suffering humanity, and voluntarily consecrated himself to his divine mission, which was the rescuing of a fallen humanity. We admire his voluntary consecration of himself to his divine mission, his magnanimity and patience, and the consistency with which, even unto the death, he perfected his work. We admire a Cromwell, a Tell, a Garibaldi; but even on the score of patriotism and devotion, what are they—the heroes and worthies of their several countries, compared to him, who was not alone the moral teacher and regenerator of all nations, but the sacrifice and the victim of the whole world! Why, studying this character, as it is drawn and presented to us in its simplicity, purity, and power, even Rousseau was moved, and said "the inventor must be a more wonderful character than the hero." The poor fisherman could not invent such a character, they were unequal to the task. How could they have invented doctrines and precepts which should revolutionise the world as Christianity has done? And in what guise did Christianity come? In that of spirituality, that was in every way opposed to the ritualism of the system that preceded it. It taught that God legislates for the soul, and will be "worshipped in spirit and in truth." It came opposed to the formalism of the age. It taught of the secret springs of human action. It held impurity not to consist in eating with unwashed hands, but in the condition of the heart. In this it differed from every creed from Judaism to Heathenism. It sought to prove to the Jews that regeneration consisted in a moral change, and that instead of looking for it—as wresting prophecy they did—to earthly aid and physical means, they should rather seek for it in a changed heart, mind, and spirit. Christianity, in short, was declared to be an aggressive war upon sense and sin. * * * Looking upon the character of Christ as a whole, its most distinguishing trait is its humility. In this it presents an utter contrariety to all that surrounds it. It stands unique in this characteristic. "God hath appointed me to preach the Gospel to the poor, to preach deliverance to the captives, the restoration of sight to the blind," &c. Singular, too, does he stand in his disinterestedness. He gave the word of life "without money and without price." He did not charge for his lectures or his sermons at two guineas each. (Hisses and counter cheers.) I am not aware that the statement of a fact ought to elicit hissing. And yet by unostentatious means, and through the agency of poor illiterate fishermen, has the religion he founded so increased and extended, that at this day the greatest intellects, as well as the greatest number of the race, bow in reverence to the name of Jesus. Sir, the want of the age and of the day is more soul, more moral force, and there is no religion which can impart this but Christianity; no one who stands forth as the exemplar of such a want but the founder of the Christian religion. In a discussion with Mr Holyoake some years since, he asserted, in speaking on this subject, that there were two Christs in the New Testament—the man who rebuked the Pharisees, and he who took little children in his arms and blessed them. But I say now, as I said then, that we are furnished with but two sides to the same character. He, Sir, is no true man, who has not a frown for the wrong-doer and oppressor, and a cheering word for the suffering. He, Sir, is no true man, who does not protest against the act of the strong man, and protect the weak ; and the Saviour, being in its true and perfect sense a true man, had his reprimand for the Pharisee, his care for the defenceless and weak, his tear for the afflicted. He, Sir, while amongst us, moved in a lowly sphere of life, preached the Gospel to the poor, and left us a name and an inheritance by which this life may be rendered a blessing, and the future an existence of immortal happiness. I find my time is up, and will therefore conclude by saying, in the terms of the proposition I set out with, that for all the reasons I have so imperfectly put before you, I am justified in maintaining that "the doctrines and precepts of the New Testament are calculated to benefit humanity."

THE BELIEF IN A PERSONAL GOD AND A FUTURE LIFE :

Six Nights Discussion between THOMAS COOPER and JOSEPH BARKER, held in St. George's Hall, Bradford.

THE combatants whose joint production we notice, are both celebrated in their way — remarkable in their antecedents, and their respective positions at present. Cooper has been a Chartist, Orator, and Martyr, and a Lecturer on Infidelity, bordering upon Atheism, but never entirely able to utter the dreadful Nay! During his Infidel days he distinguished himself by a fine literary work, "The Purgatory of Sicides," which we still hope to see in a purified form before the shadows darken around the author. For, though it is a magnificent poem, it is sadly discolored by the pain and wrath, the fear, restlessness, and misery of the doubter. Mr. Cooper, though a self-educated man, is certainly a fine scholar, and combines with great energy of reason, an imagination at least equal to his other powers. This fiery Chartist and philosophic Pantheist of former days, has been restored to his right mind. The Nazarean or Galilean has conquered. Thomas Cooper has been baptized by immersion in the ancient way, on a personal profession of his faith in the Son of the living God, and he is now an earnest preacher of the faith which he once endeavored to destroy.

Of Joseph Barker, what can we say? He has a fame which approaches very close to infamy. Some of our readers will remember when Joseph was a leading minister in the New Connexion of Methodists, and at that time he defeated Lloyd Jones, Campbell, and some other Sceptics and Socialists, in a very decided manner. When he sunk into a kind of Socinianism, he was fairly defeated by Cooke in Newcastle. When he occupied the platform of the Deist, he was routed by Brewin Grant at Halifax ; and now having returned from America once more—a fiery, flying dragon—a daring, blaspheming Atheist—he has been argumentatively overthrown by Thomas Cooper. So the Infidel lecturer has been transformed into a Baptist preacher, and the Methodist preacher into a magnate of thoroughgoing Atheism. Barker, though by no means a ripe scholar, has a great mass of miscellaneous information ; and though destitute of philosophic power of thinking, or richness of imagination, has great power of a coarse, surface, popular kind, and remarkable command over the Saxon part of our language. Perhaps there never was a human being so remarkable for self-confidence. He has worn out most of the creeds of Europe, yet during the time that he lived in them, the favored one was truth absolute and eternal ; and his last one, though it leaves him without a Father or a hope, is as glorious as any of the former ! But no human creature can have any confidence in him. It will not surprise us if, in a short time, he should swear by the golden plates of Mormon, or to hear that he dies with these words in his mouth, "There is one God, and Mahomet is his Prophet."

As to the spirit revealed by Barker in his two last debates with Grant and Cooper, it is both difficult and painful to speak. But if any one would see hatred consuming and fiendish—wrath desperate and devouring, rabid and foaming—he need not bring to us the restless hyena or the savage tiger, the heathen savage or the priestly inquisitor ; let him only behold the renegade from Christianity. This man, who once preached benevolence in such dulcet and silvery tones, now exceeds all his dark peers in unbridled ferocity, and howls and raves with imprecations not to be repeated. While on this part of the subject, let not Christian men suppose, that the anger and tempestuous outcries of unbelief, are any proof of full persuasion. Decidedly the contrary. When a man feels that the ground is not shaking under his feet, and discerns that the sky is not black overhead—when there is rock-like firmness in his convictions—there is dignity in his manner and language. Hence when we find that these men have lost all balance and repose, and are worse than wild beasts in howling and uncleanness, we are driven to the conclusion, that wrath alone is not the spring; but pain, anguish, and fear are mingling their dark waters. God is avenged upon those who deny His existence, or impeach His righteous government; and the Atheist is vainly seeking relief for his own spirit, by wild and passionate, by despairing or blaspheming outcries.

One matter there is which may claim a few minutes discussion before we notice the manner and matter of this debate. What amount of injury can the Atheist accomplish? And in what provinces of life is the evil most likely to be revealed? There are some who suppose that a great number of those who now enjoy the Divine life, may lose their peace in God and forfeit their inheritance. To provide against such an imagined result, they propose to have the uneducated brethren well drilled in historic evidence, and fortified by logical bulwarks against the onslaught, and battering rams of the enemy. We are not among those who suffer much fear in this matter. The bulk of Christian men have neither time, disposition, nor mental discipline for the pursuit of that which is abstruse and recondite. They would be bewildered and lost amid the subtleties of Patristic Fathers and Middle-age Schoolmen, and would not escape much better in balancing historic probabilities. What is it, then, that makes them strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might? It lies here—Christianity is power in itself. Bringing to lost and miserable men forgiveness, the Holy Spirit, and everlasting life, it finds response and echo from the moral nature of man. To be reconciled to the God and Father of all through the blood of His dear Son—to be sanctified by the indwelling of the Holy Spirit—to be inspired with a certain and glorious hope of life, victorious over the grave through the resurrection of Him who liveth for ever—to have God around us in providential ramparts, as the mountains are round about Jerusalem —all this is so sweet, and in the best sense so unearthly, that the weary, laboring man clasps the message to his heart. Deeply in his inmost consciousness he feels that such tidings of ransom, triumph, peace, and immortality never came from any infernal or malignant power, but must have proceeded from a God of infinite and everlasting love. The Jewish rabbins would fain have persuaded the poor man who had recovered his vision, either that he never had been blind, or that he was still blind; and certainly the man who healed him, if he was healed, was a sinner: but in his common sense way he went right to the heart of the matter—"Whether he be a sinner or no, I know not; but one thing I know, that whereas I was blind, I now see." In such practical way does the man in common life feel and reason now. He has been delivered from the dominion of sin, from the fear of death, from the tyranny of the Devil, clothed in those priestly garments which belong to the spiritual church, and his heart and lips filled with a new song; and shall he cast all away, when some bronzed apostle comes from the smoke of the pit to announce to him that God is a phantom, and the next world a coffin?

Nothing of the kind! Our Lord said, "If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself." Now the brethren who know the Lord, have tried this branch of evidence; they do not merely believe, they know that Christianity is from God—they have the consciousness of its divinity throned in their heads, dwelling in their hearts, and heaving in all the tides of their being with the music of a better land. Though we have no objection that such brethren should improve their leisure in making themselves acquainted with external bulwarks, yet we are quite persuaded that their present moorings are strong enough to save them in the blast. The principal work which Atheists can accomplish, will consist in hardening and brutalizing the people who have not yet surrendered themselves to the reconciliation of God revealed in Christ. Something must be done to prevent or neutralize their evil work, and the best method of performing our duty is worthy of the most serious consideration.

We promised to say a few words on the manner of this Discussion. Mr. Cooper will not confess that he was overcome by passion. He still insists that he maintained control over his spirit all through the debate. As it would be wrong in us to call in question his sincerity, we accept his statement, and it leads us to the following conclusion. He knew that he was about to encounter a sweep in a very filthy condition, and hence he carried a scot-bag with him, that he might be ready to exchange compliments in kind. And certainly they do grime, smear, and belabor each other very freely; while their respective friends are quite ready to cheer them on—to clap them on the back, crying "Well done, both of you." Lest our readers should suppose that we are inclined to caricature, take a sample. Thus speaks Thomas Cooper:

"Some persons think that I ought to have acted with more dignity; considering the work to be done, I could not think of dignity. I must use language suitable to the occasion. I thought there was something to be done, and as an honest man I determined to do it. It was only to be done in one way. Suppose one has to go over the crossing of a street in London; there is a man standing there with his dirty besom: I want to cross, but the man flourishes his dirty besom, and he has flourished it at all who have attempted to pass him. One exquisitely dressed, looking at him, says, 'My dear feliwak, will you allow me to pass?' But the dear fellow gives him a knock with the besom, and fills his mouth with filth. Another comes up and says, 'It is very unphilosophical, that proceeding of yours; you should not use a man in that way'—when the crossing sweeper flourishes his besom and fills his mouth with dirt. Another comes and says, 'I beseech you, in the name of —'; but before he has completed his sentence, his mouth is filled with mud. Now I see that this scavenger will throw his dirt on every one that passes, and that there is only one way to deal with him, and that is to take his dirty besom, knock it about his ears, and make him give way. That is just what I have had to do with Joseph Barker. It is a dirty job, but I have done it, and it does not need to be done again."

As Barker takes some notice of this paragraph, we will furnish the dialogue:—

"BARKER—If he has done his work as a scavenger with a dirty besom, the dirt is certainly from his own premises, and not from mine. As for the dirty besom, the dirty besom was not mine.

COOPER—It was, and I knocked it about your ears.

BARKER—Mr. Umpire, I would like to be permitted to say my closing words in peace. Thomas Cooper says that he is an Englishman; I can only say that his conduct has not been what I call English, and if he had not told us that he was an Englishman, I should have taken him for a bastard between a Gipey and a Jew."

Many scenes of this kind occur—not all so gross—but quite as bitter, personal, and vindictive. Thomas Cooper is quite mistaken in supposing the dirty work will not have to be done over again. The next combatant who meets Joseph Barker will have the same unclean labor before him, if he has the stomach for its performance. Brewin Grant, whose weapons are keener than Mr. Cooper's, did the work without shrinking; yet Thomas Cooper still found that it was to be done over again. Holy Scripture announces the fact, that it is vain to try to wash an Ethiopian white; and the Spanish proverb declares, that the shaving of an ass is a great waste of soap-lather. Both witnessses are true, and deserve consideration. We are very doubtful of any good results where compliments of such a character are freely exchanged—where men forget the language of gentlemen, and indulge in the slang of Billingsgate, and brawl as if they were in a cock-pit, or holding a coarse revel in some obscure tavern. Even Michael, the archangel, when he disputed with the Devil about the body of Moses, durst not bring against him a railing accusation, but said, "The Lord rebuke thee."

And now for the substance of the Discussion. Barker affirmed that a personal God and an immortal life, are fictions of the human mind; there are nowhere any signs or proofs of God and immortality, but everywhere proofs to the contrary; a personal God, the Maker, or even the Governor of the world, and a future life of blessedness for mankind, are great absurdities; the doctrine of an all-perfect God is both palpably false and infinitely immoral; and the only rational and the only moral doctrine is Atheism. Mr. Cooper affirmed that the existence of a personal God, the Maker and Governor of the world, and a future life, are clearly deducible by reason from the facts of the outward world, and of human consciousness. It is but justice to remark, that despite the unseemly brawling and explosions of wrath, (or righteous indignation, as a dear brother was in the habit of calling his passion) Mr. Cooper performed his argumentative work with exceeding power and earnestness. He has a richly furnished mind, and all the readiness and tact necessary for the gladiator in such platform warfare. If the work which devolves upon Christian men in this crisis must be done in such tournaments, there are few men intellectually better qualified than Mr. Cooper. He has been "a man of war from his youth," and is well skilled both in striking and parrying. May God strengthen and bless him in his last but brightest days. Mr. Barker has been all his life famous in the discovery of a "mare's nest." The last one which he has announced by sound of trumpet, is quite a curiosity in its way. In reply to the argument from the design manifest in the mechanism of the universe, Barker declares that contrivance is a proof of weakness, not of power, on the part of God. Man, argues Mr. Barker, makes a balloon because he cannot soar into the air, and a ship because he cannot walk on the water—thus confessing his weakness, and gathering power by contrivance; and so God, by contrivance, reveals deficiency in power. Such is the discovery of this erudite man, for which he deserves a diploma now, and fame in all succeeding ages. As Mr. Cooper has said very little on this point, it may be of service to make a few remarks.

1. Greater power cannot be conceived than the power of originating the raw material, causing it to exist by the mere fiat of creative will, and then making or fashioning it by plastic influence—that is, subjecting it to order, and to those rules which we call laws, on account of their uniformity. It would have evidently suited Mr. Barker better if God had left it in the rude chaotic condition, and have created some being to live in it who might have had light without the Sun, and food without the soil, and warmth without the fire; or a being who needed none of these things for subsistence or enjoyment. But Barker being (like Alphonso, King of Castile) not of God's privy council when he created the universe, had no opportunity of giving him better advice. Alas! for the consequence!! We have our own planet too hot in one region, too cold in another—prolific in poisons in one place, and barren as a stone in another: altogether a badly constructed place, not fit to live in!

2. Be it remembered, that according to the Bible account, which is supported by the traditions of all ancient nations, God has not shut himself out of the circle of created things. He is not the slave of laws, but they are all his willing servants, or effectual vassals; and every intimation of miracle shews, that He reserves within himself the power of coming out from his pavilion at any time, transcending the mediation of second causes in Nature by immediate and majestic working. So far as power is concerned, it is as easy for him to accomplish his objects without the law, as by the law—by strange visible working, as by ancient mechanism and established rule.

3. But Barker is blind to an aspect of the matter which nearly all reflective men can observe, viz. that the impress of mind is on matter, the seal of God on nature, not for the mere purpose of providing us with the productions which sustain life, but to keep us out of the mire of Atheism—to make us feel, amid the sublimities and harmonies of the temple which is seen, that there is a connection, sure and abiding, between the visible and the invisible. The One who liveth for ever shews unto us His eternal power and Godhead by the things which are made. There is not only the utility which fills our granaries and storehouses with corn, and wine and oil for material fulness, but the GLORY which is ethereal, nourishing the idealism of man, and the gleams of spiritual radiance, and voices of heavenly music, which speak directly to the spirit on behalf of God, and remain in the inmost consciousness of man. The gentleman is one of that blind company judged by Merlin, "Who judge all nature from her feet of clay, without the will to lift their eyes and see her god-like head crowned with spiritual fire, and touching other worlds." May we rather be of the number of those who "consider the work of the Lord, and the operation of his hands."

4. We might suppose from Barker's reasoning, that God was contriving and designing to meet his own necessities. Is it to feed him that we have rain, sunshine, and electricity combining their forces on the face of the earth, until she clothes her fields in gold, and drapes her woods in purple? Does he require the grain and the fruit? Nay, "if he were hungry he would not tell us, for the earth is his, and the cattle upon a thousand hills;" but all are delivered in trust to man, that he may enjoy, interpret, and worship. It is for him the visible chief in creation, to gather up into his spirit the grace and glory which are spread on sea and shore, over mountain and forest, and in his representative character give articulate voice to the wonderfulness, the wealth, variety and beauty scattered in such profusion by him who abideth for ever.

5. If we had a world, or system of things, such as Joseph Barker has had his foolish dream about, the Atheists would be more brutal and clamorous than ever. They would be quite ready to cry until they were hoarse—"This rude state of things from God! Why it is inferior to our own works! Where is the wondrous architecture, the smooth-working mechanism, the rich coloring which even we mortals can reveal in our own works? It may have existed from eternity, or have grown by necessity, but there is no Intelligent Personal God behind it."

6. But Joseph was mistaken even in the first of his affirmations, that respecting man. Contrivance is not weakness even on the part of man. On the contrary, it manifests both power of intellect and power of will—force of character allied with mental intelligence. It is one of the attributes or signs whereby his regal power, his supremacy and headship among visible things, as one made in the image of God, is revealed; for in this, in his measure as a finite being, he reflects the intelligence of the One who is infinite. We certainly discover by the labor man has in working out his plans, and giving his contrivances a body, that he is not a god, or he would only require to speak and the elements would obey him; but we do not find weakness in the slow process by which he embodies and realizes his designs. We rather discover his methodized God-given power, and its gradual evolution in surmounting and subduing refractory matter, in his true and most efficient training in the school where the Lord of life gives wisdom and strength. Joseph should have told us, by way of crowning his absurdity, that the brutes are stronger than man, inasmuch as they have no mental contrivance, but merely follow blind instinct. They manifest their power by submission to the elements, and man reveals his weakness by yoking them to his chariot of advancement, and subduing them entirely to his will.

On the argument a priori, we have little to say, except that, however sound it may be, it requires more abstraction of mind than the masses of the people are able to command. If they are to be provided with food, we must do it in the concrete world, and deal very sparingly with metaphysics. But if any one would see that famous argument in a compact form, he must look into Moses Lowman rather than into Gillespie or Dr. Samuel Clarke.

The writer of this notice wishes to cease using the "we" of the reviewer for a minute, because he knows not whether he can speak for his brethren on a certain point; hence he will only speak for himself. His opinion is, that to gather a mass of people together, and hold before them a discussion as to whether the Almighty is in existence, is a TREMENDOUS BUSINESS. He trusts that he will never be found on a platform either on one side or the other. He is sure that God requires no such championship, and is not willing to render it to the Devil.

SECULARISM IN BIRMINGHAM

BIRMINGHAM has been for some years either without an Infidel association, or with one so small and weakly, that it has kept itself entirely out of sight. But a few months back, Joseph Barker and "Iconoclast" came here to pour forth blasphemy and collect pence, and the effect has been, that the Secularist party is revived. Not that it is either numerous or strong, but, roused from a long sleep, it has become a little fussy. Accordingly, we find the following in Joseph Barker's "National Reformer" (so he insists upon calling his paper, though he must be aware that Deformer is the proper word to employ):—

"AN APPOINTED MINISTER TO THE SECULARIST CONGREGATION.—I take this opportunity of informing the friends of Secularism that the committee has engaged a young man of superior acquirements to lecture twice a week in our room, Suffolk Street, on Science and Theology.—Mr. Watson Seymour, the gentleman engaged, has taken the title of Associate in Arts of Oxford University, and can teach Latin, Greek, French, English, Mathematics, Botany, Zoology, &c. Our young friends should avail themselves of this opportunity of acquiring a knowledge of the subjects above referred to.—All who can afford to render pecuniary assistance to the committee in aid of the work they have undertaken, whether residents in the town or not, would do well to render it now."

Well, Mr. Seymour's "congregation" has given the printer a pretty good order for posters, for the purpose of informing all the men of Birmingham, that J. H. Gordon, Esq. of Manchester, would deliver three lectures in the Odd Fellows' Hall, on—1, "The Gospel of Secularism."—2, "The Pope of the Protestants."—3, "Priestism the Science of Ignorance"—all of which any sinner might hear upon payment of ninepence. That J. H. Gordon, Esq. thinks pretty much of himself, and that the said "Secularist Congregation" does not think otherwise of him, may be seen by the notice sent to all the ministers of the town, or, as another bill of theirs puts it, "all the priests of Birmingham." The note received by us reads thus:—

"To the Rev. David King.—Sir: Trusting that you are, like myself, no less an opposer of error than an exponent of truth, permit me to invite your attendance at my lecture, (as also at the other lectures I am about to deliver) on 'the Pope of the Protestants,' in the Odd Fellows' Hall, on Tuesday evening, the 30th instant, at eight o'clock. In no braggart spirit do I issue this invitation, but in the earnest hope that, as an earnest man, you will not flinch from what must surely appear no less a privilege and a pleasure, than a grave and important duty.—Yours respectfully, JOHN HENRY GORDON."

This we understood at once. The case appeared thus—if we attend, and enter into discussion with Mr. Gordon at the close of his first lecture, the effect will be, a full hall on the second and third nights. If, on the other hand, there be no discussion, there will be plenty of empty benches. Accordingly, we publicly advised people not to pay in support of the Infidel cause, and sent the following note:—

"Sir: Though not convinced that it is a privilege, a pleasure, and a duty to attend your lectures, I intend to be present, and also to reply in the same hall on the Sunday afternoons next following. Trusting you to be, like myself, desirous that enquirers 'prove all things,' I conclude that you will not object, after each lecture, to read this communication. Admission free. Relevant questions may be presented.—Yours, &c. D. KING."

Mr. Gordon read our note after his first lecture, and charged us with cowardice, and intending to backbite him when he could not be present. He demanded that we should then reply. We answered, "Certainly not—because to attempt in ten minutes a reply to an hour and a quarter's speech, and then leave you to finish up by another address in reply, would be at best but a farce—to say nothing of other reasons we could urge for not doing so. But, though no reply will be attempted till Sunday afternoon, we are willing publicly to discuss the merits of Mr. Gordon's gospel, if the Birmingham Secularists will name him as their representative, and if he would enter upon the discussion without the disputants receiving pecuniary benefit therefrom." This Mr. Gordon refused. The meeting concluded by a sort of half Secularist taking possession of the platform—his talk was deemed irrelevant, and as he would not give in, a zealous Secularist commenced to pull him off, when another of the same class rushed to the rescue, and in a few seconds the platform seemed devoted to contests of a very different kind to those for which it was erected. The lecturer and the chairman, however, immediately made their escape, the gas was turned out, and we made our exit in the dark. On the following two evenings there were about 150 present in the hall, which will hold 800.

On the second day we were waited upon by Mr. Seymour and another, in regard to the proposed discussion—"Could we not be persuaded to allow Mr. Gordon to have the cost of hotel expenses, &c. out of the proceeds? Would we consent to debate with 'Iconoclast,' or Joseph Barker?" We would debate with any person brought forward by the Birmingham Secularists, but they must pay their own priest, and after the expenses of room and printing have been met, the residue must go to the Birmingham Hospital. No help would we give them to support their lecturers. A subsequent interview gave us to know that on the part of Mr. Gordon our offer had been accepted. We are, therefore, to meet that gentleman on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, December 10, 11, and 12, in the Odd Fellows' Hall, when he is to affirm, and we are to deny—"That the Gospel of Christianity is neither the Gospel of Salvation nor of Peace, but that the Gospel according to Secularism is both."

This arrangement did not set aside our lectures. The last three Sunday afternoons we have had large gatherings in the hall, profound attention, followed by remarks from Mr. Seymour and others. Barker's National Deformer contained the following:—

"This week we have received a visit from J. H. Gordon (B. B. B.) His first lecture had for its object the diffusion of a knowledge of the 'Gospel according to Secularism,' which, he said, taught that the conduct of life must be based on knowledge and utility. The second, 'The Pope of the Protestants,' was intended to show that the Bible occupied the same position in the mind of the Protestant as the Pope of Rome does in that of the Catholic—both infallible authorities, from which no departure is possible, except at the peril of soul. The last lecture, 'Priestcraft the Science of Ignorance,' was an interesting history of the men whose influence as a body has been at once the glory of the church, the enemy of mental freedom, and the perpetual obstacle to human progress.

At the close of the first lecture the Rev. David King challenged Mr. Gordon to a public discussion on the subject of that discourse, which was afterwards accepted. At a private meeting Mr. King told us he saw no reason to decline meeting 'Iconoclast' on 'The incredibility of the New Testament History of Christ.' Mr. King imposes one uncommon condition—viz. that neither of the disputants, nor the parties to which they belong, shall receive one penny of the receipts arising from the discussion. His friends support him (he says), and why not the Secularists support their advocate? His objection is, not against lecturers being paid, but against those contributing towards paying him who do not hold his views. This difficulty has, however, been obviated by the Secular committee arranging to meet the expenses of Mr. Gordon.

There can be no objection to Mr. King holding these views, but that they are very impracticable, and decidedly unprogressive, seems obvious. According to Mr. King's theory, it is not those of the public who attend the lecture to be instructed who should pay, but those who wish to instruct, or to have the people instructed, so that, however important the message may be, the people must remain in ignorance till you are rich enough to give it them, 'without money and without price.' When the Secular party have acquired sufficient wealth for their own purposes, and more besides, Mr. King's method will enable them easily to dispose of the surplus. The love of money in Mr. King's system may be the root of all evil, but certainly the possession of it is a necessary condition of all good.

On Sunday afternoon Mr. King delivered a lecture in reply to the first of Mr. Gordon's. As it was announced that at the close of the lecture 'relevant questions might be presented,' Mr. W. Seymour, Mr. Morris, and myself, took the opportunity offered, and succeeded in producing a favorable impression on the meeting. Mr. Seymour announced that he would reply to the lecture at length on Thursday, the 8th, at our room in Suffolk-street."

The above appeared after our first lecture, and as we knew the writer, who was present at our second, we introduced him to the meeting, and having called upon the company not to laugh, we read his announcement, that after the previous lecture, they had "succeeded in making a favourable impression on the meeting." The reward immediately given, was a roar which at once enabled them to understand that the meeting itself was not of their opinion. The fact is, that Mr. Morris merely blundered out impudence and falsehood, while Mr. Seymour and his friends, though behaving gentlemanly, kept quite clear of the argument, and employed themselves with outside matters.

WORDS FROM THE WORK- TABLE—No. VII

"We see Jesus * * * crowned with glory and honor" (Heb. ii. 9.)

"We see Jesus"—Yes, it is our privilege, with the eye of faith, to look beyond the veil, and see the risen and exalted Redeemer crowned with glory and honor. It is our privilege to look up, and seeing Him, derive strength to enable us to press forward to perfection—strength to uphold us in the hour of fierce trial, even as did the first martyr. It is our privilege to gaze upon His countenance radiant with love, and drink into that Spirit which will expel from our hearts the love of the world, and destroy the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life.

But e'er we are privileged to gaze upon Jesus in His coronation glory, we must see his thorny crown and mock robes, we must kneel humbly at the foot of the cross, and there behold His agonies, hear the awful yet glorious utterance, "It is finished," and enter into the tangible darkness which covered the earth and palled the Sun. These sad and solemn scenes must have been realized, or the veil between us and the kingly glory of the Crucified One will not be penetrated.

Would we see Jesus—

"Single and clear, not weak or blind,

The eye must be

To which his glory must an entrance find;

For if his chosen ones would gaze on him,

No earthly screen

Between their souls and him must intervene."

But the world is also privileged to say—"We see Jesus." They ought to see Jesus in the members composing His body—they ought to see Jesus in the members of his church. We ought to see Jesus in one another. Do we thus see Him? Does the world behold Him in us?

When slanders and persecutions assail—when revilings meet us, can it be said that we revile not again? When trials and troubles are around us, and seem well nigh ready to overwhelm, is there the subdued spirit crying, "Not my will, but thine, O Lord, be done?"

In the ordering of home and the training of the family, do we show forth Jesus? This is to be done in the little things of every day life as well as in weighty matters, and the humblest dwelling may be pervaded by such an atmosphere of purity and love, as to compel the on-looker to acknowledge that Jesus is there. The mother, who in "patience possesses her soul," who is constant in prayer, who keeps the cross in view, will in her daily life shew forth Jesus to her children. The master, who calmly and firmly rules, who makes the Word his guide, who, in all business transactions, from love to the Saviour, does as he would that others should do, who reproves lovingly, whose first great care is to serve God, and to induce others to do so, will, to those in his employ, shew forth Jesus.

Jesus should be seen in the lives of those who profess to love Him, and it is in part because the world does not thus see Him that it continues in darkness. How great, then, the responsibility of those bearing His name! How constantly and faithfully do we need to examine ourselves! By carelessness, we are hindering the conversion of the world, and delaying the coming of the Lord. Because in us the unbelieving see not Jesus, they refuse to fall before the cross, and if they continue to refuse, will lose the crown of immortality.

Christians are called to reflect the character of Christ, so as to compel the sceptic and careless to acknowledge their superiority. Upon their every action should be stamped their relationship to Christ—being in Him they have power to overcome, and blessed are they who do overcome—

"To him who overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God."

"He that overcometh, shall not be hurt of the second death."

"To him that overcometh, will I give to eat of the hidden manna, and will give him a white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it."

"And he that overcometh, and keepeth my works unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations. * * even as I received of my Father. And I will give him the morning star."

"He that overcometh, the same shall be clothed in white raiment, and I will not blot out his name out of the book of life, but I will confess his name before the Father, and before his angels."

"Him that overcometh, will I make a pillar in the temple of my God, and he shall go no more out: and I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God, which is New Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven from my God: and I will write upon him my new name."

"To him that overcometh, will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne."

Oh! what glorious incentives to urge us on in the holy warfare; and what perfect armour we are provided with! Put it on! Keep it bright by use!—and in so doing shew forth Jesus.

We would see Jesus, that others may see Him in us—and “We would see Jesus”—the great rock foundation

Whereon our feet were set by sovereign grace;

Not life nor death, with all their agitation
Can thence remove us if we see His face.

“We would see Jesus”—for the shadows lengthen

Across the little landscape of our life—

‘We would see Jesus’—our weak faith to strengthen,

For the last weariness—the final strife.”

DUTIES OF THE EVANGELIST COMMITTEE.

To those brethren who have obeyed the truth within the last few years, and who desire to know some particulars respecting the origin and duties of the Evangelist Committee, the following summary will furnish the required information.

1—The brethren who compose the Committee are now, and have been from the first, elders or officers of the church in Nottingham. They have been requested by successive Annual Meetings since 1842, (with one or two exceptions, when no assembly of the brethren was held) to receive and disburse the contributions made by the churches and brethren for the support of Evangelists.

2—It is no part of their duties to select Evangelists, or to give directions as to the district in which they shall labor. Hitherto this has been entirely unnecessary, inasmuch as these matters have been arranged by the Annual Meeting.

3—No brother has been engaged at a given stipend quarterly or yearly; his wants, and those of his family, have been supplied, the brother himself being regarded as the best judge of the amount which might be requisite for those purposes. Whenever any Evangelist has agreed to labor exclusively under the direction of one church, the members of such church have always supported him, agreeably to mutual arrangement. In such case, the Committee are not authorized to vote any amount from the fund towards his support.

4—Any brother chosen to do the work of an Evangelist, must not only be well known to the Evangelists already in the field, but must be recommended by three different churches, who bear testimony to his moral standing, his general fitness and known capability, and his ardent desire for the work in which he seeks to be engaged.

5—The Committee have never been requested by the churches to appropriate the funds entrusted to them toward supporting the settled pastor of any church.

6—The Committee have no authority for any disbursement of the funds, except in meeting such demands as bear directly on evangelistic efforts.

BIRMINGHAM.

During the month passed since our last we have moved on much as usual. Several have been added to the church by immersion and restoration to fellowship. In addition to the usual meetings, I have occupied, on Monday evenings, a large room in another part of the town, and therein had good attendance to lectures upon “The Book of Revelation and the Present Age.” On another page will be found information concerning the stand we have taken against Secularism. I can say no more now, being about to depart (in answer to urgent calls) upon a sort of running visit to other churches.

COWDENHEATH.

It is charming to the Disciples of the Lord, when they see individuals leaving Satan's kingdom, and entering into the kingdom of our Lord and Saviour in the appointed way; but it is doubly so, when after making the change, they walk circumspectly and in the fear of the Lord. By so doing, it shows that they have passed from death unto life. It is the course afterwards pursued that proves whether the change has been made intelligently and through love to Him who died for our sins and rose again for our justification. The church meeting in Crossgates had, on the 30th September, two additions by baptism, both young men; one of them is the son of one of our brethren. On the 28th October we had another young man added in the same way. Having thus begun to serve the Lord in their youth, our prayer is, that they may continue steadfast unto the end of their pilgrimage: after which, all the faithful in Christ shall be honored to walk the golden streets with Him and each other in the New Jerusalem, where the glory of God and the Lamb is the light thereof for evermore. As a church, we are living in love and peace, and we hope, increasing in the knowledge of God.

WILMINGTON (LONDON.)

I rejoice in being able to inform you that a young female submitted to Jesus by immersion into the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, on the 14th ult. in the Hall of Progress; two more on the 7th of the present month; and another on the 10th; making four since last I wrote.—"Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy great name be all the glory."

J. M. DAVISON.

PIMLICO (LONDON.)

The Pimlico church have much pleasure in announcing to you, and the brethren generally, that they have succeeded in securing Eccleston Hall, 14, Elizabeth Street, South, for their meetings on the Lord's-day. It is a newly built, commodious place, in a good locality, situate about five minutes walk from the New Victoria Railway terminus, and calculated to seat some 250 persons.

We have had one addition lately, which makes our present number seventeen.

We shall be happy to report our progress from time to time. In the meantime, if any of our brethren who come to town occasionally will pay us a visit, we shall be glad of their presence.

T. SMITH.

SWANSEA.

Yesterday week our beloved evangelist immersed three young men in the name of the Lord, and yesterday our Elder Richards baptized three more. I am glad to say that our little church is evidently growing in the love, knowledge, and grace, of our Lord Jesus Christ. The brethren are warmly devoted to prayer, and we feel assured that our blessed Lord hears us. Our meetings are interesting, and are well attended by strangers. Surely the Lord is doing great things for us.

ADELAIDE (VICTORIA.)

I have long delayed replying to yours of April 10, chiefly owing to ill-health, from which I am thankful to our Father that I have recovered. I have received the copy of Brother Walter Scott's work, which you were so thoughtful as to send by post: I was much astonished by the depth and originality of the work; it is a valuable assistant in the study of the Scriptures. I must nevertheless find it—a fault which she men are but men at throughout the work, American government—the tyrannies of Europe are also dwelt upon, but the American government would blacken the government of Russia, is summed up in "The Negro;" no other it throughout the volume have blamed the author writing expressly in government, and in co others: under these circumstances amounts (I regret highly esteemed, and press of truth. The millennium society as government shall arrive, from American slavery reluctantly, for I am a victim of the subject, and with any American Church the subject, provided I praise of American institutions.

AUCKLAND (NEW ZEALAND.)

We received your esteemed mail, in May, by which we were informed that you had arrived. We have since then received six more. With this a remittance for Harbin the Bible Union. We have a notice on the cover from eminent men are yet employed for we have much hope in their labours. We are enabled still to attend to our duties to which, in the past, you have been called. The truth of God from old and tradition—"things from things that be of are heavenly, divine, and things that are earthly history, is, indeed, a most Few there are, even in the fully competent for the motivated by zeal, disregard worldly men, and time having that faith, hope, out in deed and in truth, sary. Still there are not bowed the knee to numbers and influence in glory of God, to the elevation to the enlightening of the and to the spread of amongst mankind in every land. We post this, which will give you some faint idea of our position politically, in this Northern island of New Zealand. At present things are unsettled with us, and there is not a shadow of a doubt on my mind as to the workings of Jesuitism in the whole question of the differences between the government and the natives. We have, moreover, a Puseyite hierarchy, dangerous as to the colonists interests from the influence they exert at home. As to the books sent to the order of Brother M'Caul, the portion of them not previously sold was removed from Brother M'Caul's premises to mine before he removed into his new house and shop, which were shortly afterwards burnt; but as he was treasurer for the church, the church money and account books being in an upstairs room, were lost in the fire. We have had a visit from a brother having a letter to us from brethren John Davies and Peter Stephen, in whom we have much interest.

HINDMARSH (SOUTH AUSTRALIA.)

I am glad to inform you that during the present month two youths of promise have made the good confession, and put on the Lord Jesus in His own appointed way. 'Tis pleasing, very pleasing, to see the young give their hearts unto the Lord Jesus, die to sin, and enjoy a resurrection to newness of life so early. Who can say the good they may accomplish by their example, their talents, and influence?

To the young we must look; they are more malleable; the conscience is more easily educated, and more susceptible of religious truth, than with those who have long wandered in the broad way.

I have been listening to some strange theology to-night; and though so strange it is popular, and advanced by the best educated of the ministry here. Mr. Brown wants union; he would not take the responsibility of this, that, or the other system, to obtain it; but he would have a prayer meeting composed of men of every sect, to pray for the "pouring out of the Holy Spirit." He evidently thinks outpouring will produce union. Should they be Methodists, Independents, or Baptists, what would they be converted too; for it is manifest the Holy Spirit cannot be the author of confusion, sects, &c.? Mr. Rakewell wonders why there should not be a baptism of the Spirit, as on the day of Pentecost, and to sustain his argument, that there should, he says, "God is as good; sinners are as precious: God is as willing to save;" &c. Another prays for Pentecostal showers that shall flood the villages, flood the whole colony, and convert the people. Another, on the same subject, says, "God is more ready to give than we to ask," &c. There must be something wrong if these statements are true; union would be established if the Holy Spirit was poured out—if there was a baptism of the Spirit as on Pentecost. God is as willing as ever, all admit; nay, more willing than they to ask, and yet they ask night after night, scores of times each night—and it is earnest asking too, for you may hear some half a mile off—and yet they continue to ask year by year and remain the same. Now I think the wrong is in the work of supererogation they would impose upon the Holy Guest. The Lord Jesus, whose words were spirit and life, said: "Neither pray I for these alone, (the apostles) but for all that shall believe on me through their word, that they all may be one" (John xvii. 20.) Have we not a right to conclude from this, that the words of the Spirit, as spoken by the apostles, are the basis of union? And can we wonder that prayer for the outpouring, a baptism of the Spirit, should not be answered, seeing that the words of the Spirit, the basis of union, are discarded, and speculations and human institutions take their place? What a spectacle, to see men wrestling, agonizing, entreating for the Holy Spirit; and yet, if you should offer to read to them the words which the Holy Spirit has caused to be uttered by the apostles, they would cast you out of their synagogues as a mocker, a denier of the Holy Spirit, an enemy, and an emissary of Satan! If a poor heavy laden sinner asks what he must do, "Oh, pray, brother! pray! wrestle, wrestle mightily! Don't let him go till he give the blessing, till you feel peace!" Peter, on Pentecost, must have been a simpleton in their estimation. Only think of him telling the people to "Repent and be baptized in the name of Jesus, for the remission of sins, and you shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit." As if a non-essential was to do any good. They seem as if they would show Peter that his plan would not do if he lived in our day.

This is the style, and these the conclusions we must come to, in respect to the revivals which sundry parties around us are trying to get up. They will pray for something to break down Sectarianism, if they can still keep their own way; but they will not search the Scriptures, to see the plan of Him who spoke as never man spake, whom God has made a Leader and Commander of his people, and of whom he has said, "This is my Son, the beloved, hear ye him."

MELBOURNE (VICTORIA.)

I received your note, with bill of lading for the box of books. It is all right. I am glad at your health being so improved. May it continue. Time with you and I must be short; I am in my 62nd year: I hope to see you in the better mansions ere long.

Still additions to the church now and again. I am glad to state that on the first day of last week, we commenced a new church at Maidstone, a young township about five miles from this; and last first-day, we began a preaching station at Footsray, another rising young town, about three miles distant. May the Father of all our mercies prosper both!

To-morrow evening our half-yearly tea-meeting is to be held, in the Temperance Hall. I hope we will spend a happy evening, and "profitable unto all things." Mr. Thomas Magarey is about the neighbourhood. I expect that he will take his parcel out of the box with him to Adelaide.

OBITUARY.

MARY WOODRUFF.

This worthy and exemplary sister in the Lord, a member of the church in Nottingham, fell asleep in Jesus, after a few days illness from inflammation of the lungs. Her sudden departure is deeply felt by her relatives and friends. She was baptized and added to the church in March, 1842, and died October 22, 1860, aged 65 years. Her last words were, "What a blessing I have not now to seek the Lord!"

FAMILY CIRCLE.

PRAYER.

Our earth is insulated. It is cut off from all intercourse with the most adjacent worlds. But even though the nearest world were peopled by holy and happy beings, and though they could cross the great gulf that severs them from us, they could accomplish little for us. They could not bind up bleeding hearts—they could not wash stains from guilty souls—they could not infuse their own felicity into gaunt and joyless hearts—and they could not transport their own sweet atmosphere so as to heal the miasma of a polluted place, or the misery of a wretched home. But what they cannot do, the Lord himself can do!

Prayer is not a message to the Moon—it is not a cry for help to the Sun, or to the stars in their courses. It is a petition addressed to him who made the Sun, Moon, and stars—it is a recourse to the ever-present and all-sufficient God—it is frailty fleeing to Omnipotence—it is misery at the door of mercy—it is worm Jacob at the ladder's foot, and that ladder's top in heaven.

THE NUMBER OF ECLIPSES.

About seventy eclipses occur in every eighteen years, of which there are twenty-nine of the Moon and forty-one of the Sun. There can never be more than seven eclipses in a year, and never less than two; and if the latter number occurs, it is quite certain that both must be of the Sun. Out of forty-one eclipses of the Sun which take place, it is calculated, that on an average, twenty-eight of these may be central at some point or other on the surface of the earth; or, in other words, it is probable that in a period of eighteen years, twenty-eight eclipses, either annular or total, will be visible, and may be observed if proper care be taken. To form an idea of their rarity in one particular country, it may be stated that for a period of five hundred and seventy-five years—namely, from 1140 to 1715—no total eclipse took place in London!

THE SIMPLE SECRET.

TWENTY clerks in a store—twenty hands in a printing office—twenty young men in a village; all want to get along in the world, and all expect to do so. One of the clerks will rise to be a partner, and make a fortune. One of the compositors will own a newspaper, and will become an influential and prosperous citizen. One of the apprentices will come to be a master builder. One of the villagers will get a handsome farm, and live like a patriarch. But which is destined to be the lucky individual? Lucky! There is no luck about it. The thing is almost as certain as the rule of three. The young fellow who will distance his competitors is he who masters his business—who preserves his integrity—who lives cleanly and purely—who never gets in debt—who gains friends by deserving them—and who puts his money into a savings bank. There are some ways to make a fortune that look shorter than this old dusty highway. But the staunch men of the community—the men who achieve something worth having, good fortune, good name, and a serene old age, all go this way!

SWISS DEACONESSES.

SOME time ago I visited some institutions for deaconesses, in Switzerland, some of which were on so small a scale, as scarcely to be more than a large family. There are, I believe, many Christian women in all ranks of society who are now anxiously inquiring, What is this calling in the vineyard? I believe the calling is generally indicated by the individual characteristics of each person. Thus, in the wide economy of Divine Providence, every Christian, however humbly endowed, has something that, well employed and consecrated, will contribute to the well-being of society and the glory of God. One lady has peculiar talent for educating the young; another, gifted with ready sympathy, delicate tact, and practical knowledge, is invaluable by the sick bed. One may turn her own talent for housewifery to the best account in industrial training, while another may find a practical starting point in district visiting. I hope to see the time when all our churches shall avail themselves of the great element of power which lies within their reach, viz.: by recognizing the employment of the deaconess, and by giving opportunity for suitable training for any of the spheres of usefulness we have indicated.

—Weekly Record.

We recommend all the brethren and sisters in Jesus, whether or not in office, constantly to keep the commandments of Jesus—to do all they can to spread the knowledge of the truth in the world; and in every possible form to alleviate the sufferings of fallen humanity. The pride of office, and who shall be the greatest, is one of the curses of the church and the world.—Ed.

THE GRAVE.

WHY should the grave be feared? For none can live
Beyond the time when mortal forms decay.
We cannot power unto the mortal give
To be immortal clay.

We all must die! Yet think not death is light.
Its gloomy vaults knew not one cheering ray.
Till Christ, in mercy, changed that dreary night
Into eternal day.

O grave! what tears have fallen o'er thy soil—
What hearts have swelled and broken into thee,
Like waves that foam and bubble for awhile,
Then sink into the sea!

Yet thou art gracious with thy flowering earth,
That softly scents the solemn scenes of death;
And thou wilt yield unto a glorious birth
The good who lie beneath.

Why should the grave be feared? The world may seem

To win our hearts, and charm us for awhile:
Thou' sweet, how less enduring than the beam
Of God's immortal smile!

Our hearts are light, our faces joy o'erspread.
Like flowers, that blossom 'ere the blight appears;
When lo! we learn our dearest friends are dead,
And bend in silent tears.

We weep for those who long have passed away—
For those whose eyes for ever will be dry:
Not dreaming that our grief obscures the ray
That glimmers from on high.

Death is a road, and heaven is our home.
And we have friends will meet and clasp us there.
They stretch their hands, they kindly whisper
"Come!"

Where all is bright and fair.

Why should the grave be feared? Our parents who
So warmly clasped us to their heaving breast,
And dried the tears our infant sorrows drew,
Lie there in peaceful rest.

We would not shun what we so loved on earth.
Thou' dark the pathway that we have to tread:
'Tis still remembered that we owe our birth
Unto the silent dead.

They gave us all when they were here below—
They wept for us when we were sorely grieved;
For us they prayed unceasingly, and lo!
Shall they be yet deceived?

They gave us all when we had naught to give:
But grateful for the blessings they have given,
Our prayers shall be, that still our souls may live
To help their own in heaven.

Why should the grave be feared? For Christ has trod
The dark and solemn pathway to the sky;
And still his footprints on the flowering sod Point souls to realms on high.

The golden sunshine, in the flowery way—
The trees that wave their bending arms above,
All tell us of a bright eternal day,
And an eternal love.

This life is but a bent and blighted flower.
And Death, the pruner, leaves us bald and bare;
Yet there shall come, far off, a golden hour,
When we shall blossom fair.

And like the stars, that glimmer from the sky,
In changeless beauty o'er this world of care,
The Christ-like soul shall find a home on high Within immortal bowers.

CONCLUDING REMARKS.

WE have now completed the twenty-first volume of this periodical, the first twelve of which, as will be remembered by many of our readers, appeared under the title of the Christian Messenger. The design which we have in view is, to present the faith and order of worship established in the apostolic age, and clearly revealed in the New Testament, to the notice of all who may come within the circle of our influence, and to claim for them supreme attention and regard. As our labors (p.v.) re-commence early in the ensuing month, will our friends do what lies in their power to uphold and increase the circulation of the Harbinger, and thus assist us in our endeavors to diffuse a knowledge of Scriptural Truth among saints and sinners?—J. W.
